IVORY SOAP

99 $\frac{44}{100}$ % PURE
IT FLOATS

THE choicest materials the world affords are selected for Ivory Soap.

These materials are analyzed and only those of the highest standard are used in its manufacture.

These extra quality materials are refined to remove all foreign matter.

Clean and free from all impurities, they are mixed in such exact proportions that neither uncombined alkali nor unsaponified oil remains in the finished product.

NO cheap materials are added to give weight and bulk—no resin, no filler.

No grit is added to make the soap clean by friction.

No perfume is added as there are no inferior ingredients whose odor must be concealed.

Skilled soap-makers, some of whom have made Ivory for thirty-nine years, test the boiling soap continually by touch, by taste and by sight.

Chemists make laboratory tests of every kettleful both during and after the boiling.

WHEN cool it is shaped into cakes with rounded edges and straight sides.

The rounded edges make it easy to turn in the hands when lathering for the toilet and bath.

The straight sides make it easy to hold and rub on clothes, a brush or a cloth when using it for laundry work or cleaning.

The cake is notched so it can be cut in two with a string. It is so large that most people prefer the half cake for the toilet.

YOU can use Ivory Soap wherever you now use the most expensive of bath and toilet soaps.

It is white and has the pleasing natural odor of its high grade ingredients.

It quickly makes a soft, copious, bubbling, lively lather.

It is pure and mild. Does not irritate the tenderest skin or leave a smarting sensation.

It rinses easily. Does not leave a greasy gloss.

It floats. Always within reach, reminding you to take it from the water. Does not sink out of sight to waste away.

THE same qualities make it equally satisfactory for fine laundry work and for the cleaning of all particular things.

You can use Ivory Soap where you now cannot use soap at all. You should use it where the soap you now use causes injury.

You get this large cake of extraordinary soap for a few cents. The immense demand for it reduces cost to the minimum.

THE CHURCH AFTER THE WAR

Timely Expressions of Opinion by Religious Leaders on a Theme of Overshadowing Importance

AT the recent Religious Congress in Pittsburg, held in October, more than 500 delegates, representing practically all the denominations, listened to a series of remarkable addresses. A number of the foremost speakers held that the time had arrived for the Church to put on new life and new vigor, and to prepare herself for the great opportunity which would come at the close of the present war. Among the leading speakers on that occasion were Dr. Robert E. Speer, Dr. John R. Mott, Rev. B. S. Winchester of New Haven, Conn., Dr. Frank Mason North, president of the Federal Council of Churches, and Bishop Francis J. McConnell of Denver, a leader in Methodism. These, with a number of others, urged that the Church should prepare for the coming emergency, which, if properly availed of, would put her once again in the forefront as the leading spiritual force and influence throughout Christendom.

In view of that discussion of a theme so important to the entire religious world, the Christian Herald invited an expression of opinion from a number of the leaders in the field of religious thought in America, explaining that the motive was constructive and helpful, rather than critical. Responses came from many different quarters. Several of the letters are published in the present issue. We believe they will appeal to the thoughtful and serious-minded in all the denominations, as well as to those Christians with no denominational attachment, for the religion of Jesus has a host of earnest followers outside of any recognized organization. All will find these contributions not only timely, but rich in suggestion. The old proverb, "Many men, many minds," finds illustration in the different angles from which the writers regard the problem. This first contingent includes the views of leaders in the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Baptist and Lutheran bodies, and also of several distinguished educators and laymen. They discuss the subject with the utmost frankness. Other contributions will follow in weekly succession.

We give the letters below:

Democracy Must Control in Religion as in All Else, if the Redemption of Humanity Is to Be Achieved, Writes Rev. Dr. J. E. McAfee

THE present is an emergency. The immediacy of the need justifies any method promising even temporary results. Spiritual forces cannot afford even to brood over their own shortcomings in the past. It is manifest that these shortcomings account for the too serious weakness of spiritual agencies in the present crisis. The Church should weep over its sins. But tears will not meet the crisis. The milk has been spilled, and a deluge of tears could only mire the going which the milk has already made slippery.

Quite properly, emergency measures are being adopted by our religious agencies. Many show a feverish zeal to do something and do it quickly. The sincerity of all who try should be commended.

But temporizing supplies no finished program. With all of the seriousness of the breakdown of our religious program, there is still danger that there shall be no general recognition of the fundamental defects of the old order. Essential democracy is lacking.

Democracy must control in religion as in every other department of organized life, if the present struggle is to achieve humanity's redemption. In religion we have been too content to accept either autocracy or anarchy. The choice has too often been between a sublimated despotism, or the dissipation of energies in a senseless confusion. Democracy abhors both. The dominating question for the future must be: What does a thorough-going democracy expect of religion? Then we must muster the courage to follow those demands to the farthest goal and into the most revolutionary measures they may call for. Religious institutions of Europe have been commonly used to buttress the forces of autocracy against the rising spirit of democracy. In more subtle and sometimes scarcely less effective ways, religion has been used in America to the same ends. It is not alone that churches have been employed to house the privileged classes and to force the alienation of class-conscious labor, but more serious still is the prevailing temper and interpretation of religion, its fundamental concepts, its creeds, its patronizing charity, its paternalism, its rigid formulas prescribed to cover essential immoralities, its petty rules designed to cultivate hypocrisy rather than unaffected virtue, its institutional and vital divorce of an alleged sacred from an alleged secular, its divine-right doctrines for clergy and church. Not religion's institutions alone, but religion itself, is often ranked in the opposition against a thorough-going democracy.

THIS is serious indeed. When the work of reconstruction is undertaken in earnest, the very foundations of our present religious order, or what have passed for foundations, must be relaid. The whole sectarian system will be supplanted. Federation of the present denominations is the latest word in religious progress. Religion must hasten to speak another and a bolder word. Federation is often our timid means of avoiding the essential issues of our religious life. It is our way of demonstrating that we either have flimsy convictions, or lack the courage of such convictions as we have been able to muster.

Fundamentally important is the getting of the religious program properly based. Democracy will demand that it be based upon the community principle. It is not necessary that a sect shall live and prosper. It is not necessary that a church shall survive. It is necessary that the community shall survive, and that it shall live and prosper. Human life is the end, and human life comes to its richest expression in social relations. The religion of democracy will see to it that the community is hallowed. No religious organization has any worthy claims, human or alleged divine, which cannot submit to this test.

Our present religious organization cannot justify itself by that test. Our sectarian order is essentially divisive, faction-breeding and faction-fostering, whereas the first need of our religious life is a quickened and abiding sense of the great brotherhood. It is idle to pretend that our religious organization exists for the common good. It is directed by a ministry a large proportion of whom tenaciously claim arbitrary divine rights for and in their office. Another proportion live for the living in their job. Still another have stepped into the treadmill and have not even the spiritual vigor to step out of it. Another proportion are sincere misfits, who have not the discrimination to discover the injury committed against themselves and their neighbors by the false system of theological training which cultivated their aspirations to spiritual leadership. What with all of these elements added one to the other, there remains a proportion—to many discouragingly small—who yearn with the prophet's soul, who speak with the prophet's tongue, and who are ready to yield themselves with the prophet's abandon to democracy's program of the divine brotherhood.

But even this remnant is sufficient. They are, at least, a start against the time now at hand when communities shall begin to realize their religious emancipation. What thousands of American communities need most of all for their spiritual regeneration is to be let alone to work out their own salvation. Democracy has a way of raising up its own leaders. Leaders who have the passion and insights of the new democracy will make more effective leaders than those who lack it, though they may be deficient in the arts and finish of the theological system.

This is far from meaning that the religious organization of the future must wait for kind-hearted ignoramuses to learn their task by the tedious process of blundering. The religious organization can command the best brains and the finest initiative and the richest sacrificial devotion which our universities turn out, and in ample quantity, as soon as our communities show the courage to throw off the sectarian bondage, refuse to permit their spiritual fabric to be rent into tatters by exploiting agencies alien to their organism, and conceive the task of community building as holy enough to require the inspirations of religion.

Democracy is patient, sometimes maddeningly patient; but when the load of oppression becomes unendurable, the thoroughness with which it liberates itself is exhilarating. The load of misconceived religious institutionalism is almost too heavy for the American democracy, and the present world crisis will quicken its yearnings for emancipation, until none can preserve the present bonds though he might desire to try.

IF all sincere spirits will withhold their support from those religious programs conceived in the sectarian, divine-right-of-clergy-and-church spirit, and will encourage every enterprise conceived in the spirit of the great human brotherhood, an emancipated democracy will win the great salvation. We shall greatly misunderstand the present issue if we suppose that a made-to-order program can be clapped down upon the religious demands of the new age. A leadership artificially trained, fostered aloof from the community heart, is precisely what we now suffer from. Good intentions of theorists will not redeem the situation. The community must be given an opportunity to express itself, to define its own need of leadership, to take a hand in discovering the prophets whom the Lord has chosen. A ministry "sent in" by the denominational system has demonstrated its ineffectiveness. Prophets "raised up from among the people" may claim the spiritual inheritance of the great inspirers of former ages. Whatever arts and culture they may properly attain

Jerusalem's Capture in the Light of Prophecy

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

I
THE Christian's pulse beats high these days, and his gaze is upward. Will the clouds soon part and the Lord appear? is the anxious thought of his heart. Some careful Bible students have ventured the opinion that his second coming may be the event that will bring this war to the end. What consternation, what paralysis it would effect in the battling armies, if the members of the Body of Christ were caught up out of their ranks! From generals to privates they would suddenly disappear and no dead bodies be left behind! What a wonder! Yes, and perhaps a king on his throne or a national President from his executive mansion would be taken. Plans would soon be brought to a standstill under such conditions, and an armistice agreed to, or a treaty of peace hurriedly arranged.

The capture of Jerusalem by the British and their allies has greatly stimulated this feeling just now. So much has been said about the Jews returning to their own land, and so commonly is it related up to the second coming of our Lord, that the two events have come to be associated as one in the popular mind. But nevertheless they are distinct and separate.

In the first place, this capture of Jerusalem may precede, by quite a period, any return of the Jews to Palestine on a large scale. The war must end first and the terms of peace be agreed upon, including the setting aside of that land for the people to whom it really belongs. Of course, this is going to be done sooner or later, but just when it will be done who can say?

We might take this occasion, however, to speak of a mysterious prophecy in the sixteenth chapter of Revelation which points to it, in the judgment of many. It is the pouring out of the sixth vial "upon the great river Euphrates," whose water is dried up "that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." The Euphrates is regarded as the symbol of the Turkish power, and its drying up is the receding of that empire from the extensive boundaries of its European and Asiatic domain into the narrower compass of its birthplace, a receding which really began at the rebellion of Ali Pasha in 1820, and has been continuing to the present hour.

"The kings of the East," or "the kings that come from the sunning" (R. V.), and mentioned in the prophecy, are taken to mean the Jews. F. C. Jennings, in a recent book, "The World Conflict in the Light of the Prophetic Word," translates the phrase, "that the way of the kings of the rising again of the sun might be prepared." The text is confessedly difficult, and we are unable to say that Mr. Jennings is justified in this rendering; but his observations upon it are worthy of thoughtful consideration. The "sun" in his judgment is here used symbolically of Christ, whose rising again refers to his coming to deliver Israel from her oppressors and to set up his Kingdom on the earth. Malachi's words come into mind, where Christ in his future relationship to Israel is described as "the Sun of righteousness," who shall "arise with healing in his wings." But to quote Mr. Jennings:

I take it, then, that in harmony with these Old Testament promises, as well as with the tenor or very atmosphere of this book, the Supreme Ruler's—the Sun's—the King's—earthly people Israel is surely to be seen under the term, "the kings of the rising again of the sun." It is their way that is prepared by the drying up of the water of the Euphrates; it is for their return to their land that the Gentile that has his foot on Jerusalem is to be pushed back whence he came.

Now, make of it what you will; say, if you please, that it is but a coincidence, or a series of coincidences; yet it is an evident fact that, as Turkey has been pushed back, so has the Jew gained a footing again in his land. A century ago he could not own a foot of it, or hardly set his foot on it, save under extremely humiliating conditions; today there are more than double the number of Jews in Palestine than returned there from Babylon in the days of Ezra.

II

IN the second place, while the return of the Jews to Palestine—the budding of the fig-tree—may be a sign of the Lord's second coming, it is not necessarily a forerunner of it. In other words, as the writer understands the prophecies, the coming does not await that return or any other happening, so far as he is aware. The capture of Jerusalem sends a thrill through our souls as though he were very near; it makes us feel his nearness as before we did not feel it; and yet if the capture had not been made, it would still be our duty to be looking for his coming at any time.

In other words, the second coming of Christ, as previous articles in these columns have pointed out, is an event of two aspects, or a grand drama of two acts: There is a coming in the air for the Church which is his body, and which will be translated to meet him there (1 Thess. 4: 13-18); and then, after an interval—the length of which is supposed from the book of Daniel to be seven years—there is a coming with his saints and his holy angels in judgment upon the living Gentile nations, and for the deliverance of his people Israel from their persecutors.

As this deliverance is to take place in the Holy Land, it is evident that ere that time Israel must have returned there in increasing numbers, and have rebuilt "the waste places" as the prophets have foretold, and even reestablished their temple worship. But there is time for this between the translation of the church and the date of its occurrence. Especially is this true if the Jews continue to return there more and more before the translation takes place, and then complete the repopulation of the land after that event.

It is this thought really that gives the intense interest to the capture of Jerusalem. And yet we would not speculate or contribute to false hopes. Especially would we cultivate the spirit of sobriety, and quietude of heart, and that patient waiting for Christ which James, the brother of our Lord, urges with such fervency upon the sojourners of the dispersion to whom he wrote: "Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient, stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."

III

THIS caution toward sobriety and quietness is very necessary in view of the extravagances to which this hope has led in other days. Even in Paul's time, men were neglecting their business and their ordinary human duties because of it. This is why he urges the Thessalonian Christians to "study to be quiet," and to attend to their "own business," and to work with their "own hands," for the very practical reason that they might "walk honestly toward them that are without," and that they themselves might "have lack of nothing." Wild fanaticism dishonors the Lord whose name we bear, and so does idleness and busy-bodyness, which commonly go with it. Our rent must be met, and our butcher paid, and our families cared for just the same even if the Lord is at the door. "Blessed is that servant whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. Verily I say unto you, that he shall make him ruler over all his goods." As the leaders of our nation warned us when this war began and when some people became hysterical, "This is no time to rock the boat."

And this reference to the war suggests another reason for soberness and fidelity to present duty. Nothing would please the powers of darkness better than the cry of "Lo, here! Or Lo, there!" that might divert the minds of easily excited people from the solemn task that now devolves upon this nation. Even if we Christians were to be caught up tomorrow, it behooves us to remember what our duty is today—a duty to the government under which God has placed us, and a duty to the people whom we would be compelled to leave behind.

The people who would be left behind? Oh, the sadness of it! Let us not be so absorbed with the things that are coming on the earth or the glory that awaits the risen saints of God, as to forget the lost and erring that are all about us. Oh, for the sounding out of the Gospel message in these days! Oh, for the proclamation to go abroad in new and mighty power. "To wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

National Anti-Saloon League Convention

By

FERDINAND C. IGLEHART

MEN from every state in the Union, including some of the most prominent, met in the National Anti-Saloon League Convention on December 10-13, at the Metropolitan Methodist Church, Washington, D. C. Splendid optimism and enthusiasm, coupled with strong, bright thoughts befittingly expressed, characterized the first session Monday night and ran through all the exercises till the close.

When Senator Morris Sheppard of Texas took the floor, the audience greeted him with cheers. In clear, concise terms he showed how the founders of the government had planned for amendments to the Constitution, and had arranged that the people themselves should be entrusted with the power to make them, and had only authorized Congress to delegate that privilege. The speaker, who had been sponsor for the Dry District of Columbia Bill and the National Prohibitory Resolution in the Senate last summer, called upon the members of the House of Representatives to pass the bill immediately.

Congressman A. W. Barkley of Kentucky, who sponsored the Dry District Bill in the House, made an address full of eloquence and point, showing the benefits of prohibition in the state of North Carolina and those that would come to the nation by the passage of the pending bill.

The first session was sandwiched between two Methodist Bishops: McDowell, who offered the prayer, and Wilson, just back from France, who closed with a thrilling address.

AT the afternoon session next day, Rev. O. R. Everhart made a scholarly and timely address on "What Lincoln Would Teach Us." Rev. F. Scott McBride in his message, on "The Final Drive for a Touchdown," became a veritable cyclone, knocking down everything before him. Dr. Ira Landrith, who ran on the Prohibition ticket a year ago for the vice presidency, caused hearty cheering when he announced that those who had supported the Prohibition party had resolved to support the candidates of the Democratic and Republican parties whenever the candidate would give pledge of hostility to the liquor interests. Father J. J. Curran of Wilkes-Barre told of the rapid progress of total abstinence in the Catholic Church, and of his hope that temperance forces will secure National Prohibition. As he sat down, a man in the audience arose and in a shrill voice cried out: "A question of privilege. It is this: We have heard Protestants and Catholics as enemies of the liquor traffic. Let me tell you I am a Jew, and I hate it! We Hebrews realize that it spoils our boys and girls, and that it brings sorrow to our families; and I have come to this convention in behalf of my race to promote National Prohibition."

On Tuesday night, three "big guns," Baker, Bryan and Borah, poured a murderous oratorical fire into the ranks of the enemy. Dr. P. A. Baker put his body, mind, and soul back of his address. Among other things he said: "Opposition to the drink traffic is buttressed in the fundamental truth that alcohol is against religion, morality, integrity, efficiency and everything that makes for human betterment. It hides the thief, protects the highwayman, shields the assassin. It is without mercy, without conscience, without patriotism. It makes no appeal for the continuation of its worthless life, except the brutal appeal of greed and appetite. The time has come not only to prohibit the making of beer in this country, but to demand of our Allies that the grain we are sending them, and that which they produce themselves, shall not be used for brewing purposes. The Christian conscience of the nation is at last mobilized and the final drive is now on for a saloonless, drunkless nation. When the brutal autoeracy of rum was broken in politics and business, it instantly changed from an asset to a liability. It is losing on every field of conflict."

William Jennings Bryan, who came next, was at his best. Sometimes Mr. Bryan is cool and deliberate in his convincing messages. But on this occasion he was charged with magnetism that flashed from his eye and burned with sarcasm and invective upon his lips. His arguments were unanswerable, and the fury with which he arraigned the toleration of beer and light wines during the war was terrific. Senator Borah, in a cool, deliberate and yet eloquent address on the value of prohibition to the workman, was enthusiastically received.

A UNIQUE feature of the Convention was the Manufacturers and Business Conference under the auspices of the committee of that name in the Anti-Saloon League, of which Mr. S. S. Kresge is chairman. The chairman sent out 350,000 letters during the past year to captains of industry, and now has a band of 15,000 business men who are cooperating with him. A meeting called to consider methods for securing nation-wide prohibition was held in the Belasco Theater, which was full; strong testimony was given as to damage of drink to business, and $240,000 was subscribed on the spot toward the million-dollar fund the committee has determined to raise as a campaign fund to secure and enforce nation-wide prohibition.

Howard H. Russell, the founder of the league, was especially honored by the Convention. This being the twenty-fifth anniversary of Dr. Russell's service as the originator and first superintendent, a suitable testimonial was presented at the closing service.

Motor Is Revolutionizing War and Farming

Trucks and Tractors Playing a Tremendous Part. A Million Machinists Mobilized by Uncle Sam

By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1917, by Frank G. Carpenter

WITHIN the past few months the chief automobile factories in the United States have been put to work on war orders. Some of them are making motor trucks, some armored cars, and others rapid automobiles for carrying dispatches. Many of the shops are making ambulances, and some, I doubt not, although I cannot tell where, are manufacturing the mighty tanks or forts upon wheels, which roll over the country, crushing down everything in their way.

Long before we entered the war, Detroit was making automobiles and motor trucks for the French and the English. One of its firms supplied 9,000 cars to the armies in France and another exported $1,500,000 worth of war ambulances. One of the makers of high-priced cars has already shipped 5,000 trucks to Europe, and another, which makes a $2,500 automobile, has sent 6,000 of his vehicles across the ocean. An establishment making a well-known cheap machine recently completed one order for 10,000 ambulances and another company is turning out 150 airplane motors every day. The government is having the machinery of many of the factories adapted to special war work. Some are making munitions, others are constructing gas engines for the use of the Army and Navy, and, in fact, the whole motor car industry has been brought to the aid of the nation.

TO show you what this industry amounts to as a war asset, I will give some of the latest figures concerning it. It grows so fast that it is almost impossible to overestimate it. It amounted to nothing twenty-five years ago, and ten years since it was a bagatelle, in comparison with others of our great industrial forces. Today the government officials admit that it stands next to steel and ships in importance, and they are rapidly mobilizing its machine shops and men.

The automobile and motor car establishments of the United States are now scattered over thirty states of the Union. There are 455 of them. There are over eighty in Michigan, fifty in Illinois, sixty-four in Ohio, and forty-five in New York. Pennsylvania has thirty-three, Minnesota twenty, Massachusetts eighteen, and California sixteen, with less numbers scattered throughout other parts of the country. In addition there are perhaps three times as many plants making automobile bodies, accessories and parts.

These establishments have in their employ the most skilled army of machinists ever gotten together. There are 980,000 of them, and added to this number are double as many men connected with the subordinate industries, which make parts, tires and other things dependent upon the automobile trade. There are a vast number making gas engines which can be used on airplanes, boats and vehicles of other kinds, and the whole force is almost as important to our army as the men in the field.

OUR motor cars now number more than 4,000,000. This means one car to every five families in the United States, and it is estimated by Logan Waller Page, the head of the bureau of public roads, that we have a motor vehicle of one kind or another to almost every mile of public and country road in the Union. The statisticians of the World Almanac say that our automobiles ran last year the enormous distance of 15,000,000,000 miles, which is equal to 600,000 times around the earth, or 166 times the distance between the earth and the sun. The figures seem incredible, but I take them from the almanac which lies before me. During that year we burned more than 1,000,000,000 gallons of gasoline in our motor cars, and wore out more than $12,000,000 worth of tires. This is truly something of a business to have grown up in twenty-five years.

The value of the motor car in the field of war cannot be overestimated. The armies now fighting have several thousand such vehicles. An estimate made last year put the German supply at 80,000 and the French at more than 100,000. The Belgian army has more than 6,000 motor vehicles, and the English army more than 60,000. During the war something like 24,000 trucks have been shipped from the United States to Europe. Such trucks are used to transport men, food and ammunition, and they have proved of dustiness is still in its infancy, and the tractor for the small farm has not yet come into use.

Not long ago the Department of Agriculture at Washington received reports from two thousand of our farmers who have been using tractors, and it was then stated that the heavy machine could be worked profitably only on farms of large size. In North Dakota the average size of the farm upon which the tractor was used was about 800 acres, and it was seldom found on farms of less than 320 acres. Iowa has many farms as small as 160 acres which are using tractors, but as a rule the owners employ their tractors also for custom work, renting them out to plow and reap for their neighbors. Many of the farmers are using their tractors by night as well as by day, and this is especially so of those who have a large acreage, such as 1,000 acres and upward.

THE average life of a tractor in North Dakota is about six years, and in other states something like eight years. The amount of service now obtained is from 3,600 to 11,000 working hours, depending largely upon the care given the machine while in and out of use. Of 200 tractor owners in Illinois 57 per cent. reported that their outfits were not out of commission a single day when they were needed during the season, and of the remaining 43 per cent. the average number of days lost was only seven.

"But how about the cost of fuel?" I asked an inventor. "Will not twenty-five-cent gasoline prevent any such industrial evolution?"

"I doubt whether gasoline will be the tractor fuel of the future," was the reply. "Kerosene is now being used on many of the machines which have been invented, and in the future the fuel will probably be alcohol, and it will be made on the farm. You can manufacture alcohol out of almost any kind of vegetable matter from grain to wood and from potatoes to hay. The refuse and waste of every farm is enough to make all the alcohol needed to run its machines, and the inventions of the future will probably make this an easy possibility. As it is, the whole business is in its infancy. There are several score of factories working upon it, and new machines of many kinds may be expected within the near future."

Why Save Wheat?

ALMOST the first question put to a speaker who presents food conservation to a church meeting is, "Why should we save wheat when millions of bushels of grain are wasted making whisky and beer?"

Not a bushel of wheat is used in making whisky. Under the Food Act manufacture of all distilled beverages is prohibited, and this took effect September 8, 1917. No grain is wasted in that way. More than that, no wheat is used in England, Italy or France for distillation for beverage purposes.

As for beer, while the Christian people strove to gain wartime prohibition, and many still hope for it, these facts are of interest so far as food conservation is concerned: In 1916 there was used in the production of malt for the manufacture of beer for home consumption and export about 60,000,000 bushels of barley, 15,000,000 bushels of corn, and 3,000,000 bushels of rice. This was about 30 per cent. of the normal barley crop and one-half of one per cent. of this year's corn crop. To prohibit the making of beer, therefore, would save 60,000,000 bushels of barley, which if milled would produce a pound loaf of barley bread per day for 6,000,000 people, if our people could be persuaded to eat it.

Why should Christian people save wheat, then? Because not a bushel of wheat is used today for the manufacture of intoxicating drinks, and wheat is the one grain our Allies must have.

Thousands of these tractors, next year, in England and America, will be breaking ground for the crops which will win the war enormous value to the forces on both sides of the battle line. The Germans used them to rush certain parts of their army into Belgium and they aided the French greatly at Verdun.

ONE sewing machine company has recently taken an order for $30,000,000 worth of tractors to be built after a new design, and I know that Henry Ford & Son have accepted orders to make thousands of cheap tractors for Europe and that they are now preparing the tools and plant to supply 6,000 to England in time for the plowing next spring. Only a few weeks ago Lloyd George said that England would have 8,000 farm tractors breaking sod at the close of this winter. Many of the famous estates are to be devoted to the raising of food, and parks and lawns upon which the grass has grown for centuries will be turned up by these tractors. Every acre of cultivable land is to be used, and the tractor is to make up for the loss of the labor demanded by the battlefields of France.

IF such a policy could be adopted and carried out in the United States, we could feed all the people upon this big round earth, and supposing space could be bridged, have enough left over for every man, woman and child on the planet of Mars. Our farming area today covers only a small part of the Union. The total amount of our land is more than 2,000,000,000 acres and so far we have less than 1,000,000,000 acres in farms. The actual amount is 878,000,000, and of this only 478,000,000 has ever been turned up by the plow. Nevertheless that comparatively small area has produced in one year more than 4,000,000,000 bushels of corn and wheat, which at the current prices of today, one-dollar corn and two-dollar wheat, would be worth more than $5,000,000,000. If we could bring all the farm lands now owned into use, this crop could be doubled, and the waste land that might be cultivated would make it many times more. The deep plowing of the farm tractor and the intensive cultivation possible through other farm machinery could easily make two bushels of corn and wheat grow where one is now growing, so that the potential food-stuffs of the United States are really beyond the dreams of the wildest imagination.

SINCE the war broke out there has been a large decrease both in plow hands and plow animals. Hundreds of thousands of horses and mules have been taken from our farms to the battlefields, and the farmers' boys who have been drafted are even greater in number. Since that time there has been a large increase in the use of farm tractors, but the in-

Christmas-Time Brings Talk of Peace

PEACE on December 20th again, for a few minutes, as on several previous occasions, crowded conflict off the center of the world stage, and claimed the attention of chancelleries and peoples.

Speaking in the House of Commons, Premier Lloyd George delivered his long-awaited address. Though he spoke of peace only as the companion of victory his address nevertheless seemed to place before the world the bases upon which Britain might be willing to negotiate. Lloyd George, as President Wilson had already done, declared the destruction of Germany's military autocracy the only way to peace.

Speaking of the military situation, the Premier said it was idle to pretend that the hopes formed had been realized. This disappointment had come through Russian collapse, but for which, he held, the German military power would have been completely humbled by this time. He asserted that while the British campaigns had not achieved the expectations formed, the military successes in Palestine would have a permanent effect on the history of the world. Jerusalem, he said, would never be restored to the Turk.

He called upon the nation for greater sacrifice during 1918 and declared that while one great power had practically gone out of the war, another great power had not fully come in and that meantime the burden on Great Britain would be considerable.

He declared also that in reserve manpower the nations allied against Germany were twice as well off as Germany and her allies and that the submarine campaign was nearly mastered.

From Germany, through neutral diplomatic channels, came the suggested peace terms printed elsewhere on this page. No official confirmation was forthcoming from Berlin and the communication was generally held to be a "feeler." While the tentative olive branch received scant attention in Washington and in Allied capitals, where every thought and effort is bent on victory, it at least serves as a possible measure of the peace that may be. It is doubly significant when coupled with a dispatch from Petrograd to the effect that the Central Powers had informed the Lenin government that they intended to make peace proposals to the Allies on the basis of no annexations and no indemnities, but considered the self-definition of nations to be impracticable. The Russian-German negotiations were held up while Russia sounded the Allies as to their willingness at this time to enter upon negotiations. It was announced, however, that in lieu of united action Germany was ready to conclude a separate peace with Russia. Later dispatches said that Germany had rejected the Russian terms and Leon Trotsky was reported to have declared in Petrograd, on December 22, that the Russians would fight against "offensive" peace terms, saying "We did not overthrow Czarism, to kneel before the Kaiser."

A Week in the World's News

PROHIBITION FOR THE NATION. The long fight to which Neal Dow gave his life, and which has claimed the best years of many another godly man, the fight for national sobriety, entered on its last and greatest battle on December 17 and 18, when the House by 228 to 128, and the Senate by 47 to 8, sent to the states for ratification a constitutional amendment providing for absolute national prohibition. The amendment provides that "After one year from the ratification of this article, the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited." The amendment also provides for concurrent enforce-

Peace Terms of Teutons and Allies

GERMANY'S TERMS

First—The future of Alsace-Lorraine to be settled through a plebiscite of its inhabitants.

Second—Germany to be remunerated for her lost African colonies, and this money to be devoted to the rehabilitation of Belgium, Serbia, Rumania and Northern France.

Third—Russian occupied provinces to become independent.

Fourth—Poland to become an independent State, so-called, under Austrian sovereignty.

Fifth—A peace conference to deal with questions of disarmament, freedom of the seas, and similar international matters.

Sixth—Turkey to remain intact.

Seventh—Rumania, Serbia, Montenegro to receive their original boundaries, with right of egress to the sea for Serbia.

BRITAIN'S TERMS

Complete restoration of the territories occupied by the Central Powers.

Full compensation for the losses of the Allies.

Disposition of German colonies to be settled by the Peace Congress, taking into account the sentiments of the people themselves.

Great Britain did not enter the war to increase by a yard the territory of any one else, but because of the belief that her honor, the question of standing by her word, was involved.

"A league of nations in which Germany was represented by a military caste triumphant would be a hollow farce. The people of Germany must be heard. That is why victory itself is more important than peace terms."

"Victory alone will give reality to terms."

ment of the law by the nation and the states, and provides that the amendment shall be inoperative unless adopted within seven years. The resolution adopted by the House differed somewhat from that passed by the Senate at the last session, but the Senate concurred in the House resolution. The principal differences between the resolutions were: The adding by the House of the provision for "concurrent" jurisdiction, the seven-year limit (the Senate had it six years), and the provision giving the liquor dealers a year from the date of ratification to clean out their stocks. This is similar to the provisions of many of the recent state laws. Attempts were made to amend the resolution to allow the manufacture of wine

Naval Affairs, on December 19, that the Navy had more than 1,000 ships in commission as against 300 two years ago, and that 424 capital ships were under construction and 350 submarine chasers beside other smaller craft. In answer to suggestions by one member of the committee that there had been some friction between the Department and Admiral Sims, Secretary Daniels denied that there had been any friction of any kind, and declared that all requests of Admiral Sims had been granted immediately, except in one or two cases where the granting was impossible. The Senate investigation into the supplying of equipment to the army disclosed the fact that there had been considerable red tape in the way of and French governments had supplied guns for the American forces in France at some sacrifice to themselves and it was declared that 25,000 more "middle heavies" were needed now for our Allies in France. Both machine guns and rifles are now being delivered, the rifles in steadily increasing quantities, machine guns more slowly, and by spring American ordnance of every grade will be ready for active service. Part of the delay in furnishing ordnance to the American forces has been caused by the fact that American mills were busy on orders for the Allies, and it was not thought wise to stop supplies to fighting armies to equip an army which was yet to see active service.

THE WHY OF THE SUGAR FAMINE. The Senate Committee investigating the food and fuel situations practically completed its investigation of sugar on December 20. Claus A. Spreckels of the Federal Sugar Refining Company declared that the Sugar Committee of the Food Administration was a mere adjunct of the Sugar Trust, and accused this committee of taking action to the advantage of the American Sugar Refining Company. Mr. Hoover retorted that Mr. Spreckels was "sore," and the testimony of Mr. Earl D. Babst, president of the American Sugar Refining Company, to a large degree counterbalanced the charges of Mr. Spreckels. He showed that he had had no part, as charged, in the advanced prices of sugar, and that the price for Cuban sugar, which Mr. Spreckels had declared too high, was less than had been paid by Canadian refiners in the open market. Mr. Babst declared that the sugar shortage in the East was largely due to transportation difficulties, the inability to secure cars, and the slow delivery of cars in transit, and that it was partly due to individual hoarding and to the use of large quantities of sugar in canning.

CANADA UPHOLDS THE EMPIRE. The Canadian elections held on December 17 were fought almost entirely on the issue of conscription, Sir Wilfrid Laurier seeking to overturn the government of Premier Borden with the promise to submit to the country a referendum on conscription. The government won one hundred and twenty-eight seats in the Dominion Parliament and the opposition 87, of which 62 were returned from the Catholic province of Quebec, which has been the chief center of anti-war sentiment in the Dominion. Conscription was reported defeated in Australia in elections held December 21.

REFORM IN BOSTON. A municipal election in Boston on December 18 resulted in the defeat of Mayor Curley by Andrew J. Peters, running on a reform non-partisan ticket. The city voted for license by about 26,000. Three other Massachusetts cities, North Adams, Waltham and Methuen, voted on the license question. North Adams voted wet; the others remained dry.

KILLED OR CAPTURED. General Pershing reported on December 16 the names of seventeen American army engineers who had been reported missing since the action at Cambrai on November 30, when a number of detachments of the American Engineers working behind the British line came into action against the counter-attacking Germans.

AMERICA'S MILITARY COUNCIL. Secretary Baker announced on December 15 the appointment of a Military War Council to be composed of the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War, and five high ranking officers of the regular army. The officers assigned to the council were the Chief of Staff, General Tasker H. Bliss, Major-General Henry G. Sharpe (Quartermaster General), Major-General E.

and beer, and to provide that a state might rescind its vote after ratifying the amendment; but each attempt was defeated by a deep and thundering "No."

On the day of passage of the Amendment Resolution, there were twenty-seven "dry" states, only nine less than the thirty-six required to ratify the Amendment; and the State of Texas, largely "dry" through local option but listed as a "wet" state, was reported as hurrying to be the first to ratify the Amendment. Prominent members of the Prohibition party and the Anti-Saloon League, the latter organization being largely responsible for the present action, prophesied that final ratification would be consummated within three years.

OUR ARMY AND NAVY. Secretary Daniels told the House Committee on prompt action earlier in the war, much of which was now being out. It was established also that at the time of the severance of diplomatic relations with Germany the ordnance department of the army had shown a strange lack of interest in possible supplies of machine guns. Following the declaration of war there was still some delay due to exhaustive tests of machine guns and changes in the English Enfield rifle to enable it to use superior American ammunition. While these delays resulted in some shortage of equipment, it seemed to be the consensus of the testimony that it would also result in the equipping of the American forces with the best rifles and machine guns in the world. Both manufacturers and military men agreed in the statement that the result justified the delay. It was established also that the British

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS INSTALMENTS

HOWARD CHASE, a young Congregational minister, single, receives a call from a church in Red Hill, a village of seven hundred people in Kansas. After consulting with his classmate and chum, Roy Lennox, he accepts the call and leaves with his sister Rose for his new field, where he is received by Mr. Burton, a deacon of his new church, and his daughter Agnes, and taken to the parsonage, and afterward introduced to the pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches. The following Sunday he preaches his first sermon.

FEW lights were showing here and there, but no one was on the street, and as she came to the track there was only the one switch-light up and down, burning, the semaphore set for clear, and the black outline of the steel bridge against the white breadth of the hill, for it was a winter morning when Number Nine became a vivid part of the girl's life history.

She had seen in a film picturing a telephone girl's heroism, an operator running out of a station during the bursting of a dam, and the girl had run the risk of her life to warn an approaching train of the danger, crossing a bridge that was going out under the impact of a great rush of freshet logs pounding against the frail supports of the bridge. Inez pictured it all again as she stood there, her eyes on the steel bridge only two hundred feet away. She could see the darting figure of the girl leaping over the timbers as they flew up, and the bridge crumbled under the torrent, but she escaped in some miraculous fashion and reached the opposite bank just as the entire structure went down the muddy gulf of wreckage, and she ran on facing the oncoming train, stopping it on the very brink of death.

"Of course it was all made up, but the danger was really all there," Inez had said as she sat looking at the film, every pulse beating with strange desire to do something as heroic.

And now, out of her exaggerated romance of her own ambition she was out there in the silent morning to test her own heart and dare to do what she dreamed she might some time have to do—she would wait until Number Nine was just showing in the inward curve of the hill and race across the bridge in time to—she scarcely gave herself a thought of how the distance should be measured, but she had seen Number Nine cross the space between the curve and the creek so often that she seemed to know, without knowing why, just how much time she ought to allow herself before entering the end of the bridge.

ONCE on the bridge there could be no turning back, and there was no space on the sides. She had been through it more than once when the little creek was bank high with a great thunderstorm and there was no danger of trains. But now she was seeking danger for its own sake—for the thrill of it, for the novelty. Life was so tame in Red Hill, so little of any real interest ever happened to her—yes, she said to herself, she would enjoy all the fulness of life she wanted. There! now! the headlight was just showing around the curve, and she ran up the middle of the track and into the bridge as the headlight swung around and thrust its blinding, stabbing spear into her face.

She recalled (sitting there on the high school steps) just how she touched every other tie as she ran, and the lifetime of horror she felt in the one second when she slipped and fell within ten feet of the other end of the bridge and said to herself, "It is all over." And the next second she was on her feet again, feeling the hot breath of the monster as it came charging into the opening, and she was outside, half way down the bank, up to her ankles in the sand and cinders, sobbing hysterically, and yet with a curious feeling of pride over her escape, and half formed promise to try it again, such as one feels, they say, who has charged up a hill in battle and escaped unhurt among the bullets that have killed half the regiment.

And as she climbed painfully back up to the rails she felt for her scarf. It was gone. She went down the embankment a little way, but could not find it, and going on through the bridge again, she searched along the ties at the spot where she fell; but no scarf was there, and she said to herself, "It must have slipped between the ties and gone down into the creek."

Going on with her retrospect as she sat there on the high school steps she recalled her surprise and fear lest she should be found out, when, two days later, an item came into her father's office from one of the paper's contributors living in the county seat ten miles from Red Hill:

"When Tom Radcliff, engineer on Number Nine, got down at Underhill today to oil Old Abe, he found on his pilot, caught on a splinter, a nice scarf. The lady it belonged to was not on the pilot, and Tom is wondering at what station she got off. Bill Granger, the fireman, says he thought he saw something like a ghost on the bridge at Ross Creek Crossing, Red Hill, last Tuesday, but Bill has always been superstitious, and this is not the first ghost he has seen this year. No one claimed the scarf, so Tom took it home to his wife. It is not every day, he says, that the pilot picks up a good article of clothing without the owner."

INEZ ran the item into the paper, and her father, reading it, commented on it briefly:

"Did I ever tell you, Inez, your mother, when she was a girl, rode on the pilot of Number Nine from Fair Oaks to Aldrich on the Irvington Division of the Santa Fe? She did it on a challenge from her brother, and nearly lost her life. She was very reckless sometimes, your mother was."

Inez's mother had been dead fifteen years, and Inez, who was seventeen when she graduated, could not recall her. All she knew was that her father idolized the daughter and seldom spoke of the mother. But for all his idolizing he did not understand his daughter, and Inez seldom confided any real life feeling to him. The last thing George Clark could picture was the sight of Inez racing up the Santa Fe track to beat Number Nine at the end of the creek bridge. He knew she was fond of the movies, and always asking to go and going without asking, but the girl's real passion for novelty and adventure and her revolt at the humdrum office life in the dull little town was entirely unknown to him, and the girl had no confidant, either man or woman.

And there was another secret Inez was keeping from her father. It was so new, it had leaped into her heart so quickly, she was so astonishingly childish about it, that he was afraid she might some time tell her father about Number Nine. That was an old secret, but new secrets are not to be lightly related to any one. And this had to do with the new minister.

"After all," Inez said to herself, as the Monday morning after Howard's first service she sat in the office picking up type for a stupid letter from an ignorant country contributor who had to be noticed, "after all, I am not to blame if I try to make life interesting in this poky town. Nothing ever happens here unless you make it yourself. And the new minister is the most interesting person I have ever seen or heard. If I should—"

She was sitting at the ease, a type between her fingers, when Howard came in. It was very early, and Inez looked around to see where her father was and then remembered he had said he was going up to the house to get some copy he had left in another coat, but would be right back.

HOWARD came up near the ease and said with his usual abruptness, "It's Miss Clark, isn't it? I meant to have met all my choir singers yesterday, but there was such a crowd I couldn't meet them all."

"Yes," said Inez. "I—"

Howard went on with careless disregard of conversation that was part of his quickness of mental and physical motion and not an intentional rudeness:

"I know it's pretty early, but I wanted to get out some dodgers as soon as possible. But I wanted to talk with your father about them, and see that the printing was going on in a certain way."

"I think father will be back soon," said Inez. "He said he would be right back. Perhaps if you are in a hurry I can tell you what you want."

Howard looked surprised, and Inez anticipated his question by saying: "I think I can set up the copy as you want it; I do most of the job work here."

"No? Do you?" Howard had been thinking of her as just a young girl. She seemed to resent his unspoken thought of her, and said quickly:

"If you don't believe I can do it, let me see the copy, and tell me what you want."

Howard laughed in his boyish way, and came up nearer the ease.

"I didn't know you did the actual work yourself. Here's what I want." He spread out his copy on top of the ease and went over it rapidly. "I want this all double leaded and in ten-point. Put the head line, 'Do You Go to Church?' right in the corner of the page, not at the top. And these sentences on each end up and down instead of across. And I wonder if your father has a cut of the church building anywhere?"

"I don't know of any, Mr. Chase. But why are you having these dodgers printed?"

As Inez asked it, the question sounded bold, and yet in her heart she was simply talking to keep him in the office as long as she could, in her eagerness to make his visit a part of her new adventure in life.

Howard looked at her in surprise, as if the question were one he would not expect from a girl like Inez. And this time he noted the fact that she was older than his first thought of her, and there was a look there that made him instantly and with intuitive quickness change his own attitude, which had been that of careless friendliness with one of his own flock; but his absolutely clean, untarnished young manhood had never once been at fault in its sense of peril wherever woman was concerned, and he had never yielded in the smallest degree to the power he must have known that he possessed.

HE moved back from the ease just a little, and in reply to Inez's question he said with a quiet gravity which had an instant effect on her:

"Why shouldn't I get them printed?"

"I don't see what is the use of inviting people to come to church when the church won't hold those who do come."

Howard laughed. It was so loud and almost boisterous that Inez was startled and confused.

"But I'm not getting out the dodgers for those who come. Only for those who don't. And I'm sure there must be a lot of people in Red Hill who have never been. Besides, I'm afraid those who have begun to come won't keep it up unless I do something to remind them. The dodgers are just to help 'em get the habit."

"Oh," said Inez. She couldn't think of anything else to say. And just then her father came in, and Howard turned instantly with his copy to him.

"I know it's early, Mr. Clark, but I want to get this printing out today if possible, and I've just been talking with your daughter about it. You see, I want something attractive for my boys to hand out."

Clark looked over the copy, and after a few suggestions which Howard accepted, he said, with a curious look at the new minister, "Pardon me, Mr. Chase, but I don't quite understand what you want those dodgers for. The church is full already. What will you do with the people you are inviting to come to church, if they come? Where will you seat them?"

Howard laughed, and Inez chimed in, a silvery ehime with just a swift look at the minister and then back to her type-setting again.

"I'm going after every person in Red Hill and vicinity. Half these dodgers are going out into the country. I understand the farmers around here have quit going to church. If we can't get folks into the building we'll go outdoors." There is a fine lot of land around the church, and we might as well use it."

Clark could not help giving the new minister a look of admiration.

"All right. Of course I don't object to the printing. It's what I live by. And the out-door meetings strike me all right. You could build out the front platform a little, put up electric lights around the yard, and—"

"Yes," broke in Howard with cheerful indifference to Clark's unfinished sentence. "Yes! Look here!"

HE took the first sheet of paper his fingers could reach and began to draw a sketch in rough outline. "Here's the front of the church. The platform is almost big enough. We can build it out here about six feet, and add, say, five here, and seat our chorus right here at the left of the door. Run the electric lights out here, and hitch onto these trees along the side. We have seventy-five chairs in the Sunday school room, and we can get as many more from Deacon Burton's undertaking room and build some benches here. We ought to be able to seat 250 people in the church grounds. Then we can range the farmers up in the road with their automobiles, parking them in two deep, so that one hundred or maybe two hundred can hear—that is—" Howard looked up from his sketch, including Inez and her father with one of his characteristic grins, "that is, I mean of course, the farmers, not the machines. Why, we ought to be able to get a crowd of five hundred people to an out-door service."

He looked up from his sketch at Clark. Inez had become so interested in Howard's fiery eagerness that she had left her place at the ease and was leaning over the imposing stone where Howard's rough sketch lay. Clark was gazing at Howard open-mouthed and grave.

"You don't mean to say, Mr. Chase, that you expect to get an audience of farmers numbering two hundred to go to church service on Sunday night. Why, there aren't twenty farmers in all the county ever came to church in Red Hill. You never can—"

"That's the reason they ought to come, then," broke in Howard. "And there's no reason, come to think of it, why we shouldn't begin with next Sunday. I can build that extension myself, and have everything all ready. Let me have that copy. I'll put on an invitation to an out-door service."

A SOLDIER OF CHRIST

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—II Tim. 2:3. "Suffer hardship as a good soldier of Christ Jesus."

A SOLDIER of Christ Jesus." Who is our Leader? There is no uncertainty in the mind of the apostle Paul. His Leader was never out of sight, never out of mind. His Leader was to the apostle Paul what a certain great mountain peak was to me during a month's wandering in the glorious land of Switzerland. Go where I would for those three or four weeks, ever and everywhere that glorious peak dominated the entire scene, morning, noon, and night, in the valley, on the hill; one turn of the eyes and it was there.

That predominant and all-overlooking peak became to me the symbol of what Jesus Christ was to the apostle Paul. "Whether we live we live unto the Lord; whether we die we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." Always in sight, always in mind, our Leader, Christ Jesus, our Captain.

WHAT is the purpose of our crusade? Whenever purpose is dull and uncertain the march of life is always slow. Whenever there is no fixity of purpose the soul is lost. In these realms to be everywhere is to be nowhere. If we have no sense of vocation there will be no progressive result. It works like this: clarity of purpose creates a passion for duty, and the passion for duty incites to strong and persistent crusade.

Therefore, as soldiers of Christ Jesus, what are we fighting for? "To preach good tidings to the poor, to proclaim liberty to the captives, recovery of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord."

That is our purpose; that is our crusade; that is what Drummond used to call "the program of Christianity," and that is the program to which every devoted and honest servant of Christ consecrates his entire strength.

WE are to preach good tidings to the poor, to take good news to the folk who live in perpetual twilight, and who long for the brighter day; to those who live on the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table; to those whose days tremble before luck and chance and caprice, and who await their precarious meal in an equally precarious home; whose life is gray and pinched, and dwarfed and broken. And what shall the good news be? That there is a God, and that God has shown his face in Jesus Christ our Saviour; that he loves the poor with a passion infinitely tender and dear; that he himself is wronged by all their wrongs, and that he shares with them the pangs of their crucifixion. To take good news to the poor, to tell them that our love shall be the token and proof of the Father's love, to try to bring them cheer and light, and hope and morning. Is that fine work, soldiers of Christ?

TO proclaim release to the captives. There are those who are held captive by outer circumstance. Their bed is always shorter than a man can stretch himself on; their life has always lacked range and freedom; they have been cribbed, cabined, and confined; they are like winged creatures in cages. There are those who are captives of insidious lust. A man may be roped to vanity or to vice, in servitude to malice, in servitude to drink; or his soul may be enmeshed by layers of flippancy and frivolity like garments of lightest gossamer. A man may be bound as Gulliver was bound, by Liliputian threads, or he may be held as in an iron cage.

And what is the soldier of Jesus Christ to do? He is to go to all these prisoners, proclaiming release to captives, and bringing the warm and cheery news of complete emancipation. Is that worth doing?

THERE are some who are spiritually blind; they have no sense of God; their life has no skies, and therefore it has no awe; they have no sense of the Divine. Then there are some who are morally blind. They have no sense of the moral values of things. They do not appreciate the morally lovely, nor recoil from the morally repellent. There are others who are just mentally dull, mentally obtuse; their thought is sluggish, their perception has never been awakened, their imagination is sleeping. All their esthetic senses are closed. Eyes have they, but they see not. They just go through life like blind men going down lovely country roads, all unconscious of the beauty by which they are beset. They are blind to the universe of God.

AND what we are to do as the crusaders of Christ is to be the ministers of vision to open the eyes of the spiritually blind, and let them see God; to open the eyes of the morally blind, and let them see moral beauty; to open the eyes of the mentally blind, and put them in correspondence with the beauties of God's wonderful world. Is that worth doing?

To set at liberty them that are bruised. People are bruised by failure, by disappointment, by defeat. They are like birds that were trying to fly and got wounded, and dropped back with damaged wing. Some power in their life has been stricken.

There are some whose love is stricken, there are some whose hopes are broken, and others whose wills are broken. What we are to do as crusaders of Jesus is to come and tenderly minister to the broken wing, to set at liberty them that are bruised.

THE last great word of this crusade is this: "To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord"; to tell everybody what glorious wealth is locked up in the immediate hours. To tell everybody that the golden age may begin just here and now; to go out to men who can talk about nothing else but ebbing days and setting suns, and buried chances, and withered hopes, and sing to them of new dawns and new openings, new unveilings, and alluring visions. To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, the glorious evangel that now is the accepted time, and that now is the day and place of salvation.

THERE is nothing soft about that crusade. There is nothing effeminate, puerile, childish about it. It is strong, chivalrous, manly. We are to be ambassadors, taking the love-decrees of the King to people who are as those that live in an alien land.

We are to be the knights at King Jesus' table, going out to deliver those that are bound. We are to be prophets, opening blind eyes, unveiling the wonders of heaven, the richness of nature and grace; and we are to be mediators, interposing lovely visions between the soul and its own despair.

That is the call of the King; that is the call of the Kingdom. That is the duty of a soldier of Jesus. That is what we fight for. What is the equipment? And what is to be our power in the fight? What are to be our weapons? With what are we to go out to accomplish our crusade? "Suffer hardship as a good soldier," says the text; but that by no means comes first. "Take therefore thy faith. Be strengthened in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." That comes first because it is first in the order of life. First be strengthened, then suffer hardship. First take in God, and then fight the devil. It is first communion and then crusade. That is always the apostolic order. First take in, and then give out.

OUR equipment is the power of grace. But what is grace? We have in our language no synonym for grace. It is just the holy love of God. There is nothing negative about it; there is nothing merely positive. The Holy Love is not an attitude, it is not self-contained sentiment; it is personal, active, outgoing power.

In "Holy Love" the adjective and the noun are both positive, energetic, operative, effective. They are both concerned with the opposition, the holy fighting the unholy and the love fighting the loveless, and seeking to convert everything unto their own nature. It is here that every young soldier has got to take his stand if he wants rightly to interpret his relation to Christ.

THERE are so many people who think of grace as the withholding and withdrawing of penalty, conciliatoriness, kindly sentiment. There is nothing in God that is aloof, there is nothing of mere posture, there is nothing even of passive regard, nothing apathetic.

Grace is infinitely more than divine favor; it is holy love radiated from the soul of the Eternal to the souls of his children, as real as a shaft of vitalizing light. God radiating holy love into the soul of his children, and by that holy love transforming them and transfiguring them and equipping them for the mission of holy love in the world of sorrow and sin. "Be strengthened with the grace that is in Christ Jesus."

IF we are to be crusaders in the power of grace it must necessarily be by means of the alliance of faith.

What is faith? Faith is the human ministry by which the grace of God becomes effective. Faith makes the human receptive of the divine. Faith makes the soul porous to God. Faith opens the soul to the waiting Lord. Faith is not refusal to weigh hypotheses; it is a willingness to take the best hypothesis and act upon it. Faith is not to make the judgment blind. It is to make the judgment register its finest verdicts in actual and incarnate life. Faith receives the holy love of God, and by receiving it is by the holiness hallowed, and by the love made lovely.

It all comes to this: We are to be crusaders in grace by faith through the witness of a sanctified and beautified life. That is our equipment.

Springs in the Desert

SUNDAY, January 6. Ps. 84:6. "Who passing through the valley of affliction make it a place of springs." The word of the psalmist would almost suggest that this wonderful transformation was effected by the pilgrims themselves as they trudged along the dry and gloomy valley. They made the valley a place of springs. In a certain way this is gloriously true. The refreshing springs were really great discoveries, but the pilgrims had cultivated the faith and the disposition which are the instruments of vision, and it was by means of these spiritual ministries that the mystic waters were found. In a very true way a new lens is a creator of a new world. What a revelation it is to a man of dull and imperfect sight when he first puts on a pair of glasses which rectifies his weakness! What new imagery! What light! What color! And so it is with a change of heart. Life is transformed by a new medium, and we discover a new world, abounding in spiritual resources, and musical with laughing, cheery springs of grace.

Here is a pilgrim traveling through the valley of affliction in feverish and impatient mood. What is the valley like to such a traveler? It is hard and cheerless. It is like a lava-strewn countryside after a volcanic eruption. Everything is black, and gray, and forbidding. It is just a dry and joyless waste. But if the pilgrim's mood could be changed into the patience of Christ, what a change there would be in the valley! For patience is a minister of fine discernment. It is endowed with the rarest senses. An inconsiderate judgment might suppose that impatience is more sensitive than patience, but that is never so. Impatience is irritable, and irritable folk are really very insensitive. They are acute in a small segment, they are numb in the circuit of the larger circle. Patience is alert on the entire circumference. Patience is very quick in seeing and hearing. When our patience in Christ has her "perfect work" our discernments are brought to superlative refinement. We hear the running brook in the desert, and we have the divining-rod which discovers the wells of salvation. We make the valley a place of springs.

Or take even finer graces still. Here is a misanthropist in the valley of affliction. What does he find in the valley? He finds nothing but aches and pains. Nothing bears the token of grace. He hears no running streams of grace. It is a ghastly journey. But now transform the misanthropist into a lover! Exchange the dark spiritual medium for one loved as a diamond! And it is amazing what friendly presences abound in the valley. Mercies and tokens of providence troop out on every side. The valley becomes a place of springs.

It makes a whole world of difference whether we go through the valley of affliction in the spirit of faith, or in a darkening unbelief; whether we journey alone or in the confidence of God's companionship. In times like these through which we are passing the valley can be a terrible place! But if we travel with the Lord our distress will not be unrelieved. We shall discover the springs which the Lord of the country has appointed for his pilgrims. We shall drink of the brook by the way. J. H. J.

The Mansions of the Soul

MONDAY, January 7. John 14:2. "In my Father's house are many mansions." Dr. Henry Van Dyke in his story, "The Mansion," describes a disembodied soul entering the eternal world, much amazed to find awaiting him no such place as he had dwelt in on earth, but only a modest cottage, an obscure place in the city of God. It was made plain to him that the celestial architects and builders had done the best they could with the material he had furnished them. This is a parable of our eternal building. Shall we be homeless in the world to come simply because we have spared ourselves the pain of reasonable service?

Before us lie unnumbered tasks. There are struggling churches to maintain. There are missions just beginning which must be built up. There are waste places in the city and country which must be redeemed. There are sick people to be visited. There are Sunday school classes to teach. There are groups of boys and girls to be led into useful forms of thought and endeavor. Politics must be redeemed from corruption and from indifference. Unpopular causes must be espoused—not because they are unpopular but because they are good. Hideous ugliness on billboards and vulgarity on the stage and in moving pictures call for our protest. We must begin to live at our best. The church can never prosper until its vast membership lives in the spirit of the apostolic injunction to reasonable spiritual service. Only they who help to build the kingdom of God on earth can "read their title clear to mansions in the skies." C. C. A.

Mercy and Truth

TUESDAY, January 8. Ps. 108:4. "Thy mercy is great above the heavens; and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds." Mercy and truth are not material substances, but God here attaches them to things of sense to teach us how real and how vast they are. We are to doubt them as little as we would doubt the skies overhead and the roving clouds. As these are seen everywhere, at the poles, at the equator, and in the zones between them, so the mercy of God is everywhere.

The world is merciless. No complaint is heard more often than that men are so unkind, cruel, un-sparing. Pity is scant among them; their helpfulness is sluggish and tardy; their charities are often insults. Moreover, there is little reliance to be placed in them. They are full of insincerity; their words are deceptions and their deeds shams. But God's pity extends over all. There is no place where a sorrowful heart may not comfort itself with the thought: God has compassion, he sympathizes with me.

Yea, let your thoughts rise to that limitless space beyond the visible heavens, let it pierce the clouds, and be assured that it shall still be in touch with the God who pities you and is sincere in all that he has said to you. His mercy and truth are not only universal, extending impartially over all, but they are also immeasurable. You may consider your case hopeless; you may imagine that while there may be mercy for others there can be none for you; you may think that you have offended too grievously. God tells you to dismiss that thought as utterly wrong. His mercy and truth reach not only as far as you are able to see, but much farther. You cannot exhaust them. W. H. T. D.

Joy in Believing

WEDNESDAY, January 9. Rom. 15:13. "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing." Joy and peace are the inspirers of hope. The God of hope is he who imparts hope by the peace of God and the joy of the Lord. Joy is like the rolling waves of the sea in majesty and power; peace is like a river in its placid tranquillity. The one is love in motion; the other, love in repose. Faith and hope, like the fleecy clouds, rise above these waters to the very heavens of attainment.

Mark Guy Pearse says, "The great sea one day looked up at a pure, fleecy cloud in the very bosom of the heavens. The sea, sighing, said: 'It is not for me; I could never be like that. But I will try.' And she hurled herself against the rocks, leaping up in tall spray which fell back, baffled and beaten. At last the sea lay quiet and still, and cried out to the sun, 'Canst thou not help me?' 'Yes, I can,' said the sun, 'if thou wilt let me.' And the sun sent down a noiseless ray, warming and loosening the water; and lo! the sea knew not how, but cried, 'I am there.'"

Believing is looking up at the Sun of Righteousness when all our struggles are o'er. It is letting him shine down upon us and lift us up into his bosom.

Doubt and despair refuse to look unto him and be saved, while faith flies away, floating triumphantly in the heavenly blue, to come down like the cloud in rain upon the thirsty earth. The secret is to let the Divine Redeemer raise you out of your sins, your fears and failings, giving you a hiding-place among the heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

The watchword of religion, of science and discovery should be, "I believe more than I see or know." This is the victory that overcomes the world of sin, of ignorance and of undiscovered countries; faith in the unseen is the mighty revealer. E. W. C.

The Deserter

THURSDAY, January 10. II Tim. 4:10. "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world." It would be interesting to know the personal history of Demas and the explanation of his apostasy. Perhaps he had popular pagan friends whose influence counteracted that of his Christian associates; perhaps he came into sudden possession of a fortune; perhaps he was "prudent," loving life, and unwilling to "throw it away." Whatever may have been the explanation of his conduct, he was a deserter.

No one of us is likely ever to make shipwreck of faith, to become a castaway, to "backslide," to "fall from grace" or "fail to persevere," if we keep in mind four things: first, that in Christ, and in Christianity—which after all is simply loyalty to the person and purposes of Christ—we have not only the best things in this world, but the best thing in all possible worlds; second, that to forsake Christ and his Gospel for any other method of salvation is to leave living fountains of water and attempt to hew out for ourselves broken cisterns; third, that ardor cools and zeal abates gradually, and by almost imperceptible degrees; and lastly, if we keep in mind the fate of that age which Demas loved more than he loved his Lord. It was an evil age, and it perished in its own corruption. If Demas could have foreseen the verdict of history upon that age, he never would have loved it. No sane man prefers infamy to honor. Who would not rather be Paul than Nero? The historian, a thousand years from now, will see more clearly than it is possible for us to see, whether we loved this present age or whether we labored with our eyes upon the goal of all the ages. C. C. A.

Longing for His Courts

FRIDAY, January 11. Ps. 84:2. "My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." Day after tomorrow is Sunday. Have you thought of it? Are you going to church? How do you feel about it? If the toil of the week has engrossed your attention to the exclusion of every thought of the coming Sunday and the service at the sanctuary, if you feel so satisfied with yourself that you think you can dispense with church-going, there is something wrong with you. This state of mind is not the normal state of a Christian.

There are people who cannot go to church and feel a great deprivation on account of it. Think of the people in our hospitals! Think of the thousands of Christian men in the trenches who have been thrown out of their ordinary mode of living. They may hear the bells ringing from the old church at home; they may be saying: Now the folks are going to church! and a tear may begin to glisten in their eyes and they may choke a sob because they cannot go.

The eighty-fourth Psalm was written for this purpose among others, to keep the soul of the wanderer who is far from his church home in touch with the dear old place around which cluster the most cherished memories of his life as a Christian. There he was face to face with the living God. There he received priceless information that concerned his eternal interests. There he was taught the true value of life. There he gathered strength for his labors, comfort in his affliction, correction for his errors, and impulses for noble deeds. There he felt the presence of Jesus and the light which only he can shed into the darknesses of our earthly life.

The longing for the courts of the Lord, for the word spoken at that place, for the prayers ascending from the sanctuary, for the sweet companionship with the members of Christ's spiritual family, is nothing to be ashamed of. But the absence of that longing is a serious matter. Wherever such absence is felt, it should cause the person to cry: Oh, Lord, revive my longing for thy courts! W. H. T. D.

"Be Not Afraid"

SATURDAY, January 12. Matt. 14:27. "It is I; be not afraid." We never realize that we have fully seen the Lord till we behold him in a storm. When the clouds are black, the winds high and the waves rolling, then to hear him say, "Peace be still," to feel tranquillity in the heart like the glassy sea where he is walking, is an experience never to be forgotten. We need to pass through some great exigency of loss, bereavement or persecution in order to realize how fully the divine presence comforts, sustains and enlarges our manhood.

If our life has been in lovely valleys, amid beautiful gardens, flowers and fruits, we have walked pleasantly with the Master and felt it good to be there; but when called to climb the summits of sacrifice, to scale the heights of self-denial, bearing the cross up the rugged hill, what visions we have had of Christ's power making us more than conquerors! What vistas of new horizons have appeared, showing that Delectable Mountains are grander than gentle valleys! Even the solitude of the desert is made beautiful by his divine indwelling.

Christ comes so much nearer to the soul in the storm or on the desert, in solitude and suffering, than in hours of prosperity and happy surroundings. He speaks from the bush of fire to a desert wanderer that he may become a leader of the people of God, a helper to redeem a world. Such solitude is sweet if Jesus be there as a partner of our joy. He can make the desert blossom as the rose and make everything live whither his river of life cometh. E. W. C.

The Prohibition Amendment

HISTORY will give a red-letter page to the passage of the Prohibition Amendment resolution through Congress on December 17. Since that abolishing negro slavery, a half-century ago, no Constitutional Amendment has been proposed so laden with moral, industrial and social potentialities.

The votes of both Senate and House were satisfying even to the most sanguine advocates. In the House there were eight more than the necessary two-thirds, and in the Senate eleven to spare. It is fair to assume that the proportions of this vote approximately represent the sentiment of the nation. The triumph marks a mighty change in a few years. It strikingly shows the irresistible force of a moral movement against tremendous organized opposition.

Twenty-seven states already having Prohibition laws make a solid foundation for the assurance that the amendment will be adopted. Only nine more will make up the required three-fourths of all the states. Texas has already started toward adoption. Although seven years is the time limit set for action by the state legislatures, it seems none too fond a hope that thirty-six will have made the amendment operative upon all within three years.

There was no vital difference between the amendment resolution passed by the Senate last summer and that passed by the House and concurred in by the Senate the other day. The unanimity in Congress, except for slight details, is fairly expressive, we take it, of the opinion and purpose of the people of the whole country.

Our Boys "Over There"

THERE are thousands of them. They have gone "Over There," as loyal sons of Liberty, to fight her battles against the intolerable aggressions of autocracy run mad. Behind them lies the safety of Democracy; before them stands the enemy. They are our boys, the sons of American mothers and fathers, the brothers and sweethearts of American girls, the big-brother heroes of thousands of other American boys, too young as yet for service, but not too young to know the meaning of "My Country."

But there are other perils than those of battle. Sin and disease care little for barbed wire or artillery barrages. There is a loyalty to God which transcends, even while it includes, devotion to country. There will be tales, many tales of heroic defense, of desperate chances nobly taken, of victories won by dying men, of defeats that lose their bitterness in the glory of resistance against overwhelming odds, of triumphs tinged with sorrow at their human cost. But there will be other tales—tales of lonely struggles against temptation when mother's training and the little khaki Testament—perhaps plus the help of the Red Triangle—have kept a life true and pure. There will be tales of faith reborn in the life in the trenches, where all the furbishings of creed fall away and the Saviour stands clearly revealed as the only hope of hungry hearts and burdened souls; tales of lives transformed by the spirit of Christ; of self forgotten in the greater cause, of humanity showing its thread of divinity amid the hell of war.

We shall hear much about our boys "over there" in 1918. The vital news of the war, the story of the fight and how it goes, of national preparation, of forces mobilized, of business enlisted, of people at home doing their "bit"—all this we may read week by week; but we search for and dwell longer upon those episodes that lie closer to the heart and that reveal the best there is in our boys. Out to them "Over There" go love and hope unmeasured, with the prayer that out of the catastrophe of war will come a new nation, a people strengthened in purpose and united.

Bringing the Profiteers to Book

PROFITEERING is a contemptible business, which has been carried on defiantly in the expectation that it would go unpunished. But the Federal Food Board of New York has just taught the profiteers a lesson which should operate as a wholesome warning to those who have been forcing the public to pay extortionate prices, since the same treatment can be applied to this class of criminals in other cities. Two wholesale grocers charged a higher price than that fixed by the Board for sugar. Complaint was made and both were convicted and sentenced to close their stores, one for a month and the other until March 1, and to refund the excess charges to the victims of their imposition. This is Mr. Hoover's way, and it is a short, sharp and effective one. The punishment of these plunderers is the best kind of an advertisement that the government means business. Now let other communities take similar steps for their own protection, and the extortioners will begin to understand that honesty is the best policy, and indeed the only safe one to follow, if they mean to continue in business. Food staples in many cities have risen from forty to eighty per cent. within a year. They are just as high in many rural communities, the retailer following the lead of the wholesaler and going even a little farther.

Some will ask, "Is the Food Administration ready to act?" It is, and we have the best authority for saying so, in this assurance which comes from Washington in the form of an official bulletin: "When the Food Administration says hoarding and speculation are going to be stopped, it means business." And this includes the profiteer, who is the meanest criminal of the lot.

Krupp Cannon on Calvary

GOOD easy-going, home-keeping folks who are comforting themselves with the assurance that the capture of Jerusalem has been accomplished without any very marked resistance, are now finding out that the Turks, true to their historical traits, did not let go so easily as was first reported.

A correspondent in the Soviet newspaper, writing before the investment of the city by the Allies, says: "Jerusalem is at present simply overrun by Turks and German officers. The heights of Calvary have been transformed into a battery! The marble and jade columns and statuary which have for centuries ornamented the place where our Saviour suffered have been removed to give way to two Krupp cannon, used for target practice, the targets being mounted on the slopes of Mount Olivet. The place where Christ taught his disciples the Lord's Prayer has been fenced in with a wattle and barbed-wire fence. Mount Olivet, from whence our Lord ascended, is the favorite center of maneuvers. Shouts, shots, bugle-calls, abuse—that is the atmosphere of the locality which for two thousand years has been the greatest sanctuary of the world."

It was not without stiff fighting on the part of the Turkish batteries on Mounts Olivet and Scopus that the way was cleared for storming Scopus with the bayonet. It seems that both Enver Pasha, the Turkish minister of war, and General Von Falkenhayn, the German commander in control of operations in the Near East, were in Jerusalem a month ago and favored evacuation, for what reason was not then made plain. All historic and sacred places in Jerusalem were preserved, but the Holy Sepulchre and other shrines were stripped of their most venerated objects by the Turks before leaving the city. Military critics, who are perhaps as fallible as other folks, regard the surrender as having taken place for the reason that Aleppo is the true strategical point at which the Turks have decided to make a stand.

The Art of Winning Confidence

THE ability to gain people's confidence quickly and retain it is of priceless value to any one who would get on in the world. It is not necessarily a part of true merit.

Many of us throw barriers in our own way. By disagreeable manners, lack of tact, or an unpleasing personality we often antagonize and repel those whom we are anxious to please and serve.

Many have to work hard to overcome the prejudice created by their first impressions, while the few without any apparent effort charm every one they meet.

Success is often due more to engaging manners and winning personality than to great talent. It is not the teacher who knows most, for instance, who is successful beyond others, but it is the one who pleases and interests through her tact and winning ways. Neither is it always the salesman who knows his business from A to Z who is most valuable to his employer, but the one who has the art of pleasing and persuading.

Well pleased is half persuaded. We are so constituted that we are influenced by what pleases us, even sometimes against our judgment.

While the art of winning favor and confidence is in many instances a natural gift, like most of the good qualities of character it may be acquired by zealously seeking it.

A bright, smiling face will do more to incline one's heart toward you and to gain his ear and mind and confidence than all the talents, handicapped by a sour visage and cold manner.

Now Is the Time

OUR subscription mail is phenomenally big these days—a sure index that great events of absorbing interest are taking place throughout the world. It is a time above all others when the intelligent American cannot afford to be without his paper, nor even to miss a single copy. The topics that are now being discussed are so vital, and the events taking place are of such tremendous moment, historically as well as spiritually, that nothing should be missed.

We expect to have this year, for the Christian Herald, the largest audience it has ever enjoyed. We look forward to a more widely extended influence than ever before. To assure this, we must make haste. Our friends can help us by sending in their renewals now, and if with their own each should send in one new subscriber, our aim would be quickly accomplished. The goal would be won out of hand.

We wish all of our readers, new and old, to be with us at the time of the opening of our new Christian Herald Information Bureau at the Nation's Capital, which will place all the resources of the government at the disposal of Christian Herald inquirers. This is a valuable privilege which you should enjoy from the beginning in order fully to appreciate all the advantages it will bring.

We are especially anxious to have every one who reads these lines join our Family Circle NOW, in order that the new subscriber may share with all the other members the benefit of the remarkable discussion which begins in this issue on "The Church After the War." It is one which is constructive and helpful, yet in which facts that must be told will be told without faltering. We can promise that it will give much enlightenment, as well as much spiritual satisfaction, to all who read these articles.

The way to make sure that you get them all is to send in your renewal today, and with it, if you can, the subscription of a new reader, whom we shall be glad to welcome to our Family Circle.

Wheatless and Meatless Days

IT isn't so much of a deprivation, after all, to have one wheatless and one meatless day per week, as most people might imagine. And it is now being done very generally in hotels and restaurants, and most loyally in homes innumerable. There is a wide variety of other available foods to choose from on such days, and no one need experience serious discomfort.

Here, for instance, is a church community in East Orange, N. J., with 1,200 members, representing 380 families. The weekly report card from 222 of these families shows that they consumed 1,727 wheatless meals and 2,976 meatless meals in one seven-day period. If all the churches came up to this standard of self-denial, it would represent a saving of 130,000,000 bushels of wheat in a single year, and meat in proportion.

Here is a pointer for pastors, showing how they can use their persuasive powers to some purpose in helping to feed our Allies, without inflicting undue hardship on any one at home.

Chaplains Welcome the Khaki Testaments

The Christian Herald, New York:

The 2,033 Testaments received, and quite a few have already been distributed. They are just the thing for the enlisted personnel. It seemed to be quite a novelty to find a name and address in the front, and for several days while the box was being unpacked, the men were swarmed about it selecting a Testament with a name from their home town, if there was one to be found. I am quite sure many contributors will receive a word of thanks from the men receiving the Testaments, and I hope that both givers and those receiving may thus be made the happier for it.

The way I have been distributing the Testaments may be interesting to you: I ask to have the men lined up in companies, and after a few words of advice as well as caution, I ask the men to accept the little gift I present to them through the kindness of others; and as I pass along, practically every man takes one. If circumstances permit, after the Testaments have been thus personally distributed, I offer a prayer and wish the company the very best possible success in every way. All seem to appreciate the gift and the prayer.

I thank you very much for the fine spirit you have manifested in sending me the Testaments, and only wish I could contribute handsomely to the cause.

Cost of Gray's Elegy

THE recent sale of a copy of an early edition of Gray's "Elegy" at a good figure calls to mind the cost of the first copy and the circumstances connected with it. To begin with, it cost the author, Thomas Gray, seven long years of patient toil to produce the immortal poem. And then he was so modest about it that he did not think it was worth publishing. He sent a manuscript copy of it to Horace Walpole, who was delighted with it and suggested its publication, and that the Magazine of Magazines would like to print it. Gray's modesty was so complete that in allowing Walpole to print it he did not care to have his name used in connection with it. He gave Walpole instructions "to make Dodsley print it immediately from your copy and without my name." Five days later, on February 16, 1751, Dodsley issued an anonymous quarto pamphlet, entitled "An Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard." Within ten years fifteen authorized English editions were called for. In these days of haste, of racing to get ahead, it is restful to look back to this man who spent seven years on one poem; who took the time to write something that was to live forever. In these days of ambitions, of desires to appear in the limelight, it is refreshing to behold the modesty of a man who had produced a masterpiece and yet was in doubt as to whether it was worthy of publication, and who even preferred not to have his name mentioned as its author. In these times of money-hunger and money-getting, it is inspiring to look at one in whose calculation the money motive did not have any place, so immersed was he in the things of the spirit. His work and life encourage us to obey this command, "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth." (Col. 3 : 2.)

Mysterious Whispering Tree

HENRY HEINELL of Santa Monica, Calif., who two years ago sent geologists to the wilds of Malibu by reporting a nest of dunes of singing sands, has again caused nature students to "prick up their ears" and listen to the whispering of mysterious trees which he reports to have discovered. The find was made far up in Las Tunas Canyon, where the county surveyor's gang recently ran lines for a mountain road to connect the seashore via this scenic canyon, the Topanga, at its junction with Garrapatas. The mysterious trees are near the bottom of the canyon, far above the trickling stream. Persons passing along the road at this point are invariably attracted by what sounds to them as if somebody in the undergrowth were talking in a subdued voice. Shouts failing to bring a response, Mr. Heinell, after listening to the supposed whispered conversation, left the trail and descended the precipitous side of the mountain, expecting to discover some hunter who had fallen and injured

Whale Meat for Food

INVESTIGATORS for the British government were recently sent to the North Pacific whaling stations to make a thorough inquiry into the whaling industry and to subject the meat to cold storage and chemical tests to determine if large supplies could be transported to Europe and remain in good condition. It is reported that these tests proved satisfactory, and it is expected that the British government will soon take up the question of importing enormous quantities of whale meat from the United States. Whale meat has long since taken its place beside the beefsteak, the mutton chop and other meats in the markets of the Pacific coast. The dealers report that the demand of the consuming public for whale meat is increasing remarkably. Many people declare that they would rather have whale meat than a juicy slice of sirloin of beef. It is estimated that Great Britain has slaughtered approximately 105,000,000 beef cattle since the war began. Canada at the present time has only 6,000,000 head of cattle, while the United States has approximately 30,000,000. Demand for a substitute becomes increasingly urgent with the passing of each month, and indica-himself, but there was no evidence of life anywhere. The sound always came from the same general direction, and, going in that direction, he found a clump of scrubby trees, much in appearance like the English holly, and there he found the solution of the mystery. The needle-like points of thousands of leaves, swayed by the breeze blowing up the canyon, and scratching upon the surface of other leaves, were responsible for the chorus. The noise made by one leaf was so slight that it could not be heard a foot away, but the thousands continuously made the chorus that could be heard from the bridge above. All nature has a voice which whispers mysteriously the wisdom, goodness and love of the Creator. The prophet pictures nature joining in the chorus of rejoicing and thanksgiving at the coming of the Kingdom of the Christ. "The mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands." (Isa. 55 : 12.)

tions are that whale meat will solve the food problem.

This has been a banner year for the whaling industry on the Pacific coast. One whaling station alone has made a catch of 200 whales this season, while there are more than a score of stations on the Pacific coast from California to Alaska. The whale weighs on the average a ton to the foot, and the length varies from 50 to 125 feet. A ready market is now found for all meat available, while a short time ago it was used almost exclusively for fertilizing purposes. Whale meat is coarse-grained and has a taste similar to that of venison, but a distinctive flavor all its own. It is both palatable and wholesome. A chemical analysis recently made shows that it contains about ninety-eight per cent of digestible material, whereas the average meat has rarely more than ninety-three per cent. There is no mention in the Bible of a man eating a whale, but there is the story of a large fish swallowing a man. Christ makes this reference to it with the lesson: "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." (Matt. 12 : 40.)

Drink, the Assassin

IN a number of recent murder trials the attorneys for the prisoner, to save him from conviction of the premeditation that would demand the extreme penalty, have pleaded that their client was under the influence of liquor and did not know what he was doing. While the law does not regard drunkenness as an excuse for homicide, jurors sometimes let the fact of mental incapacity on account of drink enter into their thought in fixing the penalty. There is the closest relation between drink and assassination. The very word "assassination" had its origin in a drug habit. The drug hashish, or Indian hemp, for which the Egyptians will pay such a high price, gave rise to the word assassin in this manner: There was a band of desperadoes in Persia in the eleventh century, a secret society, members of which were under a vow of blind obedience to their chief. These ruffians were called upon to perform the most atrocious deeds, and before they were sent out to perform their gruesome tasks they were given hashish, by which they were thrown into a kind of ecstasy or intoxication. Hence they were called "Hashishin," meaning hemp eaters. The word became a part of western language, but was changed into "assassins." Drink is an assassin; it attacks the reason and makes the maniac; it kills love and makes the murderer. Now is the time for the victim of drink to reform. The Persian assassin has his successor today in one who, through the influence of drink, kills another, and in the gunman who makes the saloon his headquarters where he lays his plans and from which he goes forth to execute his diabolical deeds. It is little wonder, then, that this curse was pronounced: "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth thy bottle to him, and maketh him drunken also." (Hab. 2 : 15.)

IT is an almost universal impulse for a man, woman or child to kill a snake on sight, and in the slaughter there is little or no discrimination between the harmless and dangerous ones. Mr. G. K. Norton in an article in American Forestry makes a plea for the snakes on the ground that they destroy mice and rats, which carry disease and waste the farmers' crops, and says that snakes should rather be raised than killed as a matter of economy. He says: "Of our 111 species but seventeen are poisonous—two species of elaps, coral snakes, and fifteen species of crotaline snakes, the copperhead and moccasin, the dwarf and typical rattlesnakes." Notwithstanding this good advice the girls will scream hysterically at the sight of the innocent gartersnake in the garden and either try to kill it or get some one else to do it, and the boys will have a real picnic in hunting for anything in the form of a snake. Some tribes worship snakes, but most people destroy them at sight in accordance with this curse: "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." (Gen. 3 : 15.)

Bicycle Gearing for Boats

THE annual water carnival recently held in Copenhagen was a notable event greeted with large crowds, and attended by the Danish Royal family. Some curious craft were entered for the races, none more so than the boats propelled with bicycle pedals and gearing, or the paddles on the side. The craft of olden times were equipped with oars for propelling their boats. Even the ships with masts and sails had oars to be used when necessary, and the smaller boats got their motor force solely by paddling against the water with oars. In the reference to Tyre, a maritime city, there is this mention of them: "Of the oaks of Basham have they made thine oars." (Ezek. 27 : 6.)

A Business That Is Getting Religion

By
LOUIS E. ORCUTT

A BOY is willing to be religious, but he must play. He may go to Sunday school, but he will have recreation. For a good many years the church tried to do business on the ten commandments, sundry catechisms, standardized lessons and the annual picnic. The boy seldom missed the picnic, but he often showed a more or less open disregard of the others. Meanwhile, those whose purposes were not entirely holy, but who sought profit as men reckon it, discovered certain recreations which all boys liked. They made good use of those recreations in an evil way, and good folks, seeing the smoke-burdened, unholy, beer-smirched air of the pool rooms and bowling-alleys, horrified at the lives that started from these places in a voyage toward shipwreck, unthinkingly blamed the forms of recreation instead of the men who used them for their own gain.

It was the Y. M. C. A. that first called these games from the service of sin to the true service of clean amusement under proper auspices. There were some who thought the Y. M. C. A. was playing with dangerous fire when it began to install alleys and tables in its buildings. But as building after building thus equipped became the center of boy life in its town, new ideas regarding these games began to filter through the web of prejudice which had beggared the minds of those who had sought by pure teaching, unsupported by material aid, to convince the boys of the vital relation of revealed truth to their future success and happiness.

It began to be evident that the way to lead a boy to active faith led through a ministry to his craving for physical action. The Y. M. C. A. broke the trail, and the churches now are following. The Y. M. C. A. proved that bowling, a game that combines skill and steadiness of eye and hand with beneficial exercise, would attract boys and young men in growing numbers when unaccompanied by a cigar stand or a side door to a bar, and that the fellows who came first to bowl would gradually gain an interest in the other activities of the Association, so that it was often a short road from bowling to Bible study. They demonstrated that games which followed hard on the heels of the Association in its equipment to minister to the honest and natural and necessary instincts for play in such a way that it may be able to minister also to the equally natural need for spiritual exercise and instruction. Thus the church, once dark six days a week, is now, through its well-equipped basement or parish house, ministering daily through "don'ts." The new method is a well-synchronized series of "do's" which bids youth have a good time in a healthful and harmless way.

The extent to which churches are reclaiming from sordid uses these clean games in which young life revels is shown by the fact that one company of several dealing in alleys and billiard-tables sold to churches in 1916 over $39,000 worth of new equipment and answered inquiries from 348 pastors or church officials who were considering a purchase. At the present time, eighty-five per cent. of all the Y. M. C. A. buildings of the nation are equipped either with billiard-tables or bowling-alleys or both. Nearly every Y. M. C. A. hut at the cantonments has, or plans to have, its tables. It is not too much to expect that some day eighty-five per cent. of our churches will be thus equipped. Denominational lines do not appear in this movement. Churches now equipped are allied with all Protestant bodies, although in proportion of churches equipped the Presbyterians lead, followed by the Episcopalians, Methodists, Congregationalists, Lutherans and Baptists. All over the nation the saloon is being driven out, but the popular games which proved such potent bait for vice are proving an even better attraction for virtue, and the manufacturers, who once found their market among surroundings which they deplored but could not remedy of themselves, are now finding a better and a wider market in the homes, the churches and the Y. M. C. A.'s.

Many parents have found, too, that a clean amusement in the home keeps son at home and brings his friends there. Thus the home and the church have united to redeem the chosen recreation of their young men from the associations which once used them to their own profit and the boys' undoing.

The game room in the boys' department of the Twenty-third Street Y. M. C. A., New York City challenge all a boy has of skill of hand and of eye did not require for their success either tobacco smoke or hrid language. In fact, the Y. M. C. A. determined what many had believed, that these games were clean in themselves and that they were the most consistently effective means of holding large groups of growing boys under wholesome influences.

The institutional church, the church that is equipped to preach the Gospel through both word and deed, has the element of clean recreation, wisely guided, to fine groups of boys and girls, of young men and young women, whose former defection from its Sunday schools it had deplored but could not explain. And the young folks who crowd the alleys and game rooms on week days fill the Sunday school classes and young people's meetings on Sundays.

The cleansing of recreation is a true office of religion. Formerly this office was performed by a series of warning

S EVEN temperance organizations, all to secure both war-time prohibition and the submission of the Federal Amendment for National Constitutional Prohibition, camped at the doors of Congress at the very opening of the session. Among these was the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which held its meetings in Poli's Theater during the first week of December. Although there was no free entertainment for this convention, it was the largest the W. C. T. U. has yet held, there being 906 voting delegates present, and a great number of visitors.

Men were much in evidence upon the platform. Nearly every day, members of Congress were introduced. Senator Gore of Oklahoma told the women that he had become a convert to Woman Suffrage, and he would vote for that as well as for the other measures that the W. C. T. U. desired. On one afternoon the whole Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church visited the convention, and brief addresses were made for this Board by Bishop McDowell and Dr. Clarence

Convention of the W. C. T. U.

By MRS. MARTHA M. ALLEN

True Wilson. On another day all the state superintendents and field secretaries of the Anti-Saloon League filed on to the platform, and an address representing them was made by Dr. Purley Baker, their general superintendent. It was very cheering to the W. C. T. U., who for years fought almost alone against strong drink, to see this great array of men now pressing the battle toward its victorious finish.

MRS. S. R. WRIGHT, president of the W. C. T. U. of Canada, told of the religious leaflets sent to France by the Canadian W. C. T. U. for the Canadian soldiers. Over 20,000 soldiers registered that they wished to receive the leaflets. Mrs. Wright told of the grief of Canadian women over the "wet" canteens of Great Britain, and over the rum ration served to the soldiers in the trenches.

Much distress and indignation were expressed by delegates in regard to the popular campaigns for tobacco and cigarettes for the soldiers and sailors. Resolutions against this kind of effort were passed by the convention, and a copy of them sent to Secretary Daniels and Secretary Baker.

The determination to have the destruction of grain and sugar in the manufacture of beer stopped was voiced by many speakers. Among these was Mrs. Mary Harris Arnor of Georgia, who said that the government is alienating the sympathy of thousands of women by asking them to conserve food, while millions of bushels of grain are worse than wasted in making a harmful and unnecessary drink like beer.

CAPTAIN J. H. MOFFATT of the Ordnance Department came before the convention with a plea for help.

He said that hundreds of stenographers are now needed in government employ, and they cannot get them. He asked that patriotic young women stenographers and typists come quickly to the aid of the government. The salary begins at $1,100 a year. The Civil Service examinations are not difficult. Address 1333 F Street, Ordnance Department, Washington, D. C.

The Chief of Police for the District of Columbia was introduced to the convention. He said that the business men of Washington who opposed the law now say, "Now it has come we see it has not killed business, nor driven people from the city." In November, 1916, there were 838 arrests for drunkenness, and in November, 1917, 199 arrests, a decrease of 639, or 76 per cent.

A VITAL change in the time of holding national W. C. T. U. conventions may be pending. It is possible that a change of time from fall until spring will be made, and that the next convention will come in May or June, 1919.

The Church Must Have a Deeper Sense of Responsibility for the Spread of the Gospel, Writes President W. R. Moody of Northfield

THE greatest need of the Christian Church, in my judgment, is a deeper realization on the part of its laity of their individual responsibility for the spiritual welfare of the world.

I do not mean by this increased giving of money or time to home and foreign missions, important as I recognize this to be. I do mean, however, a sense of responsibility for the spread of the Gospel among those with whom we individually come into immediate contact. There are certain responsibilities which we can delegate to no one, whether they be ministers, evangelists, Sunday school teachers, or religious leaders of any kind. It is the responsibility for the man in our employ, or the business acquaintance.

Christian leadership is not the immediate need. We have lots of leaders. It is not more organizations; for there are times when one feels that we are over-organized in almost every department of Christian work. What we do need is a deep sense of responsibility on the part of each professed Christian man for the spiritual welfare of his neighbor. Should the laity be awakened to a consciousness of this responsibility, whether in the great military camps throughout the country, or in the mercantile houses, or wherever Christian men mingle with those who are alien to Christ, there would be a spiritual awakening such as this land has never seen. This was the way in which the Church first spread throughout the pagan world, and it has always been the method which God blessed in the past.

The Church Must Take a Larger and More Practical Course, and Exalt the Spiritual, Writes President Shaw of Elmira College

I AM in accord with you in the opinion that the time has come when the Church must enter upon a larger and more practical course, if it is to meet the changing conditions of the present time. Two or three things seem most imperative, and without these I fear that no advance could be made along such lines as would be at all worthy of the Church or the age.

(1) There must be more actual unity and cooperation among the several branches of the Christian Church; and in order to bring this about, either questions of doctrine and polity must be put completely into the background, or a working agreement entered into by the several churches at once generous and inclusive.

(2) All ecclesiastical organizations and machinery must take secondary place, and a freedom of method and responsibility allowed, commensurate with the magnitude of the work to be done.

(3) The primary accent in all movements or undertakings which the new program might call for must be pre-eminently spiritual. A purely sociological aim will fail to unite the Church in any general or aggressive way.

We are certainly upon the eve of the greatest opportunity the Church has ever had, and I devoutly pray that all leaders may be given unusual guidance in planning for "this grand and awful time."

The Church Needs Spiritual Leaders with Vision and Ability, Many More, Writes Dr. Hubert C. Herring

THERE is one need which to my mind overtops all others in the life of the Church at the present moment—the need of leaders.

The Church of Christ cannot possibly substitute for the fragmentary history of the past a strong united future of high achievement in the molding of larger concerns of men according to the mind of Christ, unless she can command the devoted service of the very strongest types of character and ability. The addition of 100 ministers of the first order to each of our leading communions in the United States would mark the beginning of a new era of aggressive and united effort. I have in mind, of course, men whose gifts are not merely of the mind but of the whole man in emotion, vision and ability to bring things to pass.

The Church Must Proclaim the Gospel with the Voice of Authority, Writes Bishop Wm. A. Quayle

THE business of the churches after the war and during it should be a manly proclamation of the Gospel of the Son of God. We have definitely weakened our Church appeal to people because we have cluttered up our proclamations with so many things comparatively trivial as ranked with the Gospel, that people did not know what we stood for, but thought the Church was a modified and weakened Ladies' Aid Society or Civic Club or Charity Organization. We have shibbolethed so much social service, which means much or little according to who uses it, that people have lost sight of the majesty of the Church, which is the Voice of God sounding out above men's hearts to make their ways the ways of God, when all earthly and eternal matters would chime like a chime of bells.

A Christ for sinners, adequate to the cleansing of the heart and hands and history, will make appeal, as for ages it has made appeal. The Saviour for the lost is the Gospel we do well to summon our voices to proclaim.

The Church's Future Depends upon the Piety of the Rising Generation, Writes Rev. Junius B. Remensnyder

THE Congress of Religious Leaders lately assembled at Pittsburg evidently has been extraordinary in its personnel, and in the ability and wise counsel displayed in its discussions of matters of vital interest to Christians.

The great issues pressing upon the Church now are, first, her attitude as to the tremendous question of war and peace. And here she should speak out boldly, as becomes her province. The Church alone is truly international, because she is of all lands, languages and races. To preserve this spiritual unity amid the dreadful passions and prejudices of war, to be true to the Headship of Jesus Christ while loyal to the individual nation, and to be ready to take the leadership in the equity of the final terms of peace, is the great, legitimate calling of the Church in this world-crisis.

As to the religious conditions of the hour, one of the very first importance is that to which Dr. Winchester called attention in the words: "The present world-situation challenges the attention of all Christians to the task of religious education." The future of the Church depends upon the piety of the rising generation. With no religious teaching in the schools, and the neglect of Bible-reading and family devotion in the home, our young people are growing up without the deep religious convictions of former times. What can be done to remedy this defect?

Another grave question is the strengthening of our denominational schools. Our wealthy and cultured Christians are more and more sending their sons and daughters to colleges and seminaries, because of their magnificent endowments, where religion is not taught and where our youth come home with quixotic and infidel sentiments. Hence they are lost to the Church.

One more vital thought, voiced by Dr. Robert E. Speer and others, is the need of maintaining the evangelical faith and Christian spirit in our pulpits, Sunday schools and all our teaching. First of all, we must make our people genuine Christians. It is only when men and women are converted, are full of power and the Holy Ghost, that they will become efficient workers for Christ.

Such vital questions as these were earnestly considered at this important religious congress, and nothing can be more helpful than for leaders of the Church to meet together to investigate them.

Church Reconstruction Coming, and the Logical Leaders Already Found, Writes Governor Capper of Kansas

I HAVE read with a great deal of interest your letter of October 31, and the article in the Christian Herald of the same date entitled, "The Church and the War."

I believe it is a credit to the Church that the religious conference at Pittsburg was devoted almost entirely to the war. It seems to me that, to be worthy of the purpose for which Christ founded the Church, it must follow the way pointed by this war and become more of a democratic institution.

The development of the Church has been too individualistic; the principle of creeds rather than the principle of service has stood foremost.

Every institution must justify its existence before the bar of reason; the present Church exists too largely to teach the principles of religion. Because of the over-emphasis of creeds its real mission so become obscured.

From the first place among the institutions of the world the Church has been relegated to one of minor importance; it has not kept pace with the commercial, economic and social development of the world. Generally speaking, the Church lacks executive leaders. The Church now has a chance to prove its worth to a war-stricken world. It can do it only through unity of purpose and subordination of individual creeds.

The logical leaders for the new work have been found. Thousands of business men are today supporting the Church, in hope that it will become of greater service to humanity. These business men foresee a reconstruction period for the Church.

The Y. M. C. A. points a lesson and a danger to the Church. It has been a campaign planned and executed by business men, but to do so it disassociated itself from churches and creeds and became a religious and patriotic, but not necessarily a church, organization. This war, as no previous one, is a spiritual war.

The Crusades contain no deeper spiritual utterance than the "World must be made safe for democracy," and on this principle of equality and justice to all people is being fought to a finish the most gigantic and barbaric war of history.

On the one side no thought of materialistic gains; while on the other a colossal scheme for world domination by might, the enslavement of free peoples and the overthrow of all that has been gained in civil government during the Christian era.

Any lasting peace pact must be democratic, not diplomatic in nature, and based on brotherly love taught by Christ.

Sink All Divisive Issues and Work for the Supreme Plan to Secure World-Peace After This War, Writes Dr. Clark, Christian Endeavor Founder

IT is a tremendous task that the Church has before it, so to adjust itself to present conditions that it may become a dominant force in helping to settle the great moral issues raised by the war. The conference at Pittsburg was a move in the right direction; the addresses were fine and strong; but these earnest words must be backed up by individual Christians throughout the country, to make them of any effect.

In the first place, we must have a larger and closer fellowship. Divisive issues which keep Protestants apart must be sunk, and while denominations continue, mere sectarian differences of creed or polity should be forgotten in the great task before the Church.

Again, we must not lose heart or hope. A hopeless Christian is a very useless one. A hopeless Church or a hopeless Christianity is doomed. However dark the clouds of war, however threatening the future may seem, God is not dead.

As a practical matter, I think the churches should even now prepare for the end of the war by familiarizing the young people with the idea of the future League of Nations, with an International Court of Arbitration, without which the war for democracy will have been fought in vain. In time of war prepare for peace. This does not mean that the churches should attempt to bring about a premature or unrighteous peace; but that when the war does end, be it soon or late, the churches should be ready to take advantage of the one supreme plan, which, with God's blessing, would insure the future peace of the world.

This, with the fellowship of the people of God in all lands when the war is over, will do more than all things else to heal its wounds, and to bring the nations together again in a workable harmony. Shortly after the Boer War and our own Spanish War, I saw the young people of the enemy nations fraternizing in Christian fellowship and singing together, "Blest be the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love." A vast opportunity awaits the churches of our land."

THE WITNESS

By Grace Livingston Hill Lutz
Author of "The Voice in the Wilderness"

THEY went to see the church member, who proved to be a good old soul, but deaf and old and very poor. He said they had to give the church up; they couldn't make it pay. All the rich people had moved away. He shook his head sadly and told how he and his wife were married there. He hobbled over and showed them how to get in a side door.

The yellow afternoon sun was sifting through windows of cheap stained glass, and fell in mellow quiet upon the faded cushions and musty ingrain carpet. The place had that deserted look of having been abandoned, yet Courtland, as he stood in the shadow under the old balcony, seemed to see the Presence of the eternal God standing up there behind the pulpit, seemed to feel the hallowed memories of long ago, and scent the lingering incense of all the prayers that had gone up from all the souls who had worshiped there in the years that were past.

"They think an iron-foundry's going to buy it, or else some one may make a munition-factory out of it," the old man contributed. "This war's bringing a big change over things."

"Their plowshares into swords, their pruning-hooks into spears," chanted an unseen voice, sadly, behind Courtland. His face set sternly. He turned to Pat: "I can't let that happen, old man!" he said. "I'm going to buy it if I can. Come, we'll go and look it up!"

Pat looked at his companion with awe. He had always known he was rich, but—to purchase a church as if it were a jack-knife! That sure was going some!

COURTLAND did not return to the seminary until Tuesday morning. By that time he had bought his church.

"Well," said Pat, "that sure was some hustle! There's one thing, Court. You won't have to candidate for any church like those other guys in your little old seminary."

"Pat," said Courtland thoughtfully, "this church has got to have a new name. 'Church of God for sale' has killed this one! A church that used to belong to God and doesn't any more is what that means. They have sold the Church of God, but his Presence is still here!"

A few weeks later, when the two came down to look things over, the granite arch over the old front doors bore the inscription in letters of stone:

CHURCH OF THE PRESENCE OF GOD

Courtland stood looking for a moment, and then he turned to Pat eagerly: "I'm going to get possession of the whole block if I can; maybe the opposite one, too, for a park, and you've got to be physical director! I'll turn the kids and the older boys over to you, old man!"

Pat's eyes were full of tears. He had to turn away to hide them. "You're a grand old dreamer!" he said, in a choking voice.

So the rejuvenation of the old church went on from week to week. The men at the seminary grew curious as to what took Pat and Courtland to the city so much. Was it a girl? It finally got around that Courtland had a rich and aristocratic church in view, and was soon to be married to the daughter of one of its prominent members. But when they began to congratulate him, Courtland grinned.

"When I preach my first sermon you may all come down and see," he replied, and that was all they could get out of him.

One afternoon, as Courtland was preparing to hurry to the train, there came a note from Pat, who had gone ahead on an errand:

DEAR COURT—Tennelly's in trouble. He's up at his old rooms. He wants you. I'll wait for you down in the office. PAT.

CHAPTER XXXII

TENNELLY was pacing up and down the room. His face was white, his eyes were wild. He had the haggard look of one who has come through a long series of harrowing experiences up to the supreme torture where there is nothing worse that can happen.

Courtland's knock brought him at once to the door. With both hands they gave the fellowship grip that had meant so much to each in college.

A moment they stood so, looking into each other's eyes, Courtland wondering, startled, questioning. It was Gila, of course! Nothing else could reach the man's soul and make him look like that! But what had happened? Not death! No, not even death could bring that look of shame and degradation to his high-minded friend's eyes.

As if Tennelly had read his question he spoke in a voice so husky with emotion that his words were scarcely audible. "Didn't Pat tell you?"

Courtland shook his head.

Tennelly's head went down, as if he were waiting for courage to speak. Then, huskily: "She's gone, Court!"

"Gone?"

Tennelly fumbled in his pocket and brought out a crumpled note, blistered with tears. "Read it!" he muttered, and turned away to the window.

Courtland read:

DEAR LEW—I'm sure when you come to your senses and get over some of your narrow ideas you'll be as much relieved as I am over what I've decided to do. You and I never were fitted for each other, and I can't stand this life another day. I'm simply perishing! It's up to me to do something, for I know, with your strait-laced notions, you never will! So when you read this I shall be out of reach, on my way to Italy with Count von Bremen. They say there's going to be war in this country, anyway, and I hate such things, so I had to get out of it. You won't have any trouble in getting a divorce, and you'll soon be glad I did it.

As for the kid, if she lives she's much better off with you than with me, for you know I never could stand children; they get on my nerves. And, anyhow, I never could be all the things you tried to make me, and it's better in the end this way. So good-by, and don't try to come after me. I won't come back, no matter what you do, for I'm bored to death with the last two years and I've got to see some life!

GILA.

COURTLAND read the flippant little note twice before he trusted himself to speak, and then he walked over to the window, slowly smoothing and folding the crumpled paper.

"Nelly, old fellow," he said tenderly.

"You know that I feel with you—"

"I know, Court!" with a weary sigh.

"That's why I sent for you. I had to have you, somehow!"

"Nelly! There aren't any words made delicate enough to handle this thing without hurting. It's raw flesh and full of nerves. There's just One can do anything here! I wish you believed in God!"

"I do!" said Tennelly, in a dreary tone.

"He can come near you and give you strength to bear it. I know, for he did it for me once!"

Courtland felt as if his words were falling on deaf ears, but Tennelly, after a pause, asked, bitterly:

"Why did he do this to me, if he's what you say he is?"

"I'm not sure that he did, old man!"

I think perhaps you and I had a hand in it!"

Tennelly looked at him keenly for an instant and turned away. "I know what you mean," he said, "but I'm afraid I'd do it again! I loved her! God! I'm afraid—I love her yet! Man! You don't know what an ache such love is."

"Yes, I do," said Courtland, with a sudden light in his face; but Tennelly was not heeding him.

"It isn't entirely that I've lost her; that I've got to give up hoping that she'll some time care and settle down to knowing she is gone forever! It's the way she went! The—the—the disgrace! The humiliation! The awfulness of the way she went! We've never had anything like that in our family. And to think my baby has got to grow up to know that shame! To know that her mother was a disgraceful woman! That I gave her a mother like that!"

"Now, look here, Tennelly! You didn't know! You thought she would be all right when you were married!"

"But I did know!" wailed Tennelly.

"I knew in my soul! I think I knew when I first saw her, and that was why I worried about you when you used to go and see her. I knew she wasn't the woman for you. But, fool that I was! I thought I was more of a man of the world, and would be able to hold her! No, I didn't, either, for I knew it was like trying to enjoy a sound sleep in a powder-magazine with a pocketful of matches, to trust my love to her! But I did it, anyway! I dared trouble! And my little child has got to suffer for it!"

"Your little child will perhaps be better for it!"

"I can't see it that way!"

"You don't have to. If God does, isn't that enough?"

"I don't know! I can't see God now; it's too dark!"

Tennelly dropped upon his knees beside the table and laid his face on his folded arms in an attitude of despair.

A wave of pity swept over Courtland. He dropped upon his knees beside his friend and spoke aloud:

"O Lord God, come near and let my friend feel thy Presence now in his terrible distress. Somehow speak peace to his soul and help him to know thee, for thou art the only One that can help him. Help him to tell thee all his heart's bitterness now, alone with thee and find relief."

Softly Courtland arose and slipped from the room.

GILA had been gone two months when the day was finally set for Bonnie's wedding.

There had been consultations long and many over what to do about telling Tennelly, for even Bonnie saw that the event could not but be painful to him, coming as it did on the heels of his own deep trouble. And Tennelly had long been Courtland's best friend; at least until Pat grew so close as to share that privilege with him. It was finally decided that Courtland should tell Tennelly about the approaching wedding at his first opportunity.

Bonnie had long ago heard all about Gila, been through the bitter throes of jealousy and come out clear and trusting, with the whole thing sanely and happily relegated to that place where all such troubles go from the hearts of those who truly love each other and know there never could be any one else in the universe who could take the place of the beloved.

Courtland had been preaching in the Church of the Presence of God for four Sabbaths now, and the congregation had been growing steadily.

The men at the seminary got wind of it somehow, and came down by twos and threes, and finally dozens, as they could get away from their own preaching, to see what that close-mouthed Courtland was doing, and went away thoughtful. It was not what they had expected of their brilliant classmate, ministering to these common working people right in the neighborhood where they lived and worked.

AT first they did not understand how he came to be in that church, and asked what denomination it was, anyway. Courtland said he really didn't know what it had been, but that he hoped it was the denomination of Jesus Christ now.

"But whose church is it?" they asked.

"Mine," he said, simply.

Then they turned to Pat for explanation.

"That's straight," said Pat. "He bought it."

"Bought it! Oh!" They were silenced. Not one of them could have bought a church, and wouldn't have if they could. They would have bought a good mansion for themselves against their retiring-day. Few of them understood it. Only the man who was going to darkest Africa to work in the jungles, and a couple who were bound, one for the leper country, and another for China, had a light of understanding in their eyes, and gripped Courtland's hand with reverence and ecstatic awe.

"But, man alive!" lingered one, unwilling to leave his brilliant friend in such a hopeless hole. "Don't you realize if you don't hitch on to some denomination, or board of trustees, or something, your work won't count in the long run? Who's to carry on your work and keep up your name and what you have done, after you are gone? You're foolish!" He had just received a flattering call to a city church himself, and he knew he was not half so well fitted for it as Courtland.

BUT Courtland flung up his hat in a boyish way and laughed. "I should worry about my name after I am gone," he said. "And as for the work, it's for me to do, isn't it? Not for me to arrange for after I'm dead. If my heavenly Father wants it to keep up after I'm gone he'll manage to find a way, won't he? My job is to look after it while I'm here. Perhaps it won't be needed any longer after I'm gone. The New Jerusalem may be here by that time and we won't have to have any churches. God himself shall be the tabernacle!"

They went away then with doubtful looks, and Courtland heard one say to another, shaking his head in a dubious way:

"I don't like it. It's all very irregular!"

And the other replied: "Yes! It's a pity about him! He might have done something big if he hadn't been so impractical!"

"The poor stew!" said Pat, dryly, looking after them. "They haven't got religion enough to carry them over till next week, the most of them, and what they'll do when they really see what kind the Lord is I can't guess! I wonder what they think that rich young man that Jesus loved would have been like, anyway, if he hadn't gone away sorrowful and kept his vast possessions."

Courtland wrote it all to Bonnie, and Bonnie, with a tender smile, leaned down and kissed the words in the letter, and murmured, "Dear impractical beloved!" all softly to herself.

For Bonnie was very happy. That such a prince among men, such a friend of God, should have passed by others of rank, of beauty and attainments far greater than hers, and come away out West to take her, fairly overwhelmed her with wonder when she had time to think about it. For she was as busy as she was happy in these days. There was her school work, her music, the little home duties, all she could make Mother Marshall leave for her; the beautiful sewing she was doing on her simple bridal garments; and stealing time from all to write the most wonderful letters to the lover in the East.

SOFTLY Bonnie went through these days, tender, happy, blithe as a bird; a song on her lips whenever she went about the house; a caress in her very touch for the dear old people who had been father and mother to her in her loneliness; realizing only vaguely what it was going to be to them when she was gone and they were all alone again. For her heart was so full of her own joy she could not think a sad thought.

But one afternoon she came home from school a little earlier than usual. Opening the door very softly that she might come on Mother Marshall and surprise her, she heard voices in the dining-room, and paused to see if there was company.

"It's going to be mighty hard to have Bonnie leave us," said Father Marshall, with a wistful quaver.

There was a soft sigh over by the window, then Mother Marshall: "Yes, Father, but we mustn't think about it, or the next thing we know we'll let her see it. She's the kind of girl that would turn around and say she couldn't get married, perhaps, if she got it in her head we needed her. She's got a grand mau, and I'm just as glad as I can be about it"—there was a gulp like a sob over by the window—"I wouldn't spoil her happiness for anything in the world!" The voice took on a forced cheerfulness.

"Sure! We wouldn't want to do that!"

"It's most as bad as when Stephen was going away, though. I have to just shut my eyes when I go by her bedroom door and think about how we fixed it up for her and counted on how she'd look, and all. I just couldn't stand it. I had to shut the door and hurry down-stairs."

"Well, now, Mother, you mustn't feel that way. You know the Lord sent her; maybe he has some other plan."

"Oh, I know!" said Mother, briskly. "I guess we can leave that to him; only seems like I can't bear to think of anybody else coming to be in her room."

"Oh, no! No! We couldn't stand for that!" said Father, quickly. "We'd have to keep it for her—for them—when they come home to visit! If any other party comes along I reckon we'll just build out a bay window on the kitchen chamber, and fix that up. Now don't you worry, Mother. You know he promised to bring her home a lot, and it ain't as if he hadn't got money enough to travel, let alone a noddymobile. I shouldn't wonder maybe if we could go see them, even, some time. We could get to see the university then, too, and go look at Steve's room. You'd like that, wouldn't you, Mother?"

Bonnie did not go into the dining-room to surprise them. Instead, she stole away down in the orchard to hide her tears.

A little later she saw the postman ride up to the letter-box on the gate-post and drop in a letter, and all else was forgotten.

Yes, from Paul! A lovely, big, thick letter!

Mother and Father Marshall and their sadness suddenly vanished from her thoughts, and she hurried back to a big stump in the orchard, where she often read her letters.

CHAPTER XXIII

"DEAR BONNIE ROSE" [she read, and smiled tenderly. He was always getting her a new name.];

I've been to see Tenny at last, and he's great! What do you think? He's coming to the wedding! Says he wouldn't miss it for the world.

Father and my stepmother will come; but please tell Mother Marshall she needn't worry because they will only stay for the ceremony. I know she was a little troubled about my stepmother, lest things would seem plain to her; bless her dear heart! But she needn't at all, for she's a kindly soul. They will come in their private car, which will be dropped off from the morning train and picked up by the night express at the Junction, so you see they'll have to leave for Sloan's Station early in the afternoon.

But the greatest news of all I heard to-night! You remember how we wished that Burns hadn't gone to China yet, so he could marry us? Well, he's coming back. He's been sent on some errand or other for the government, in company with a Chinaman or two, and he's due in San Francisco a week before the wedding. I've sent a wireless to ask him to stop over and take part in the ceremony. I was sure this would meet with your approval. Of course, we'll ask your minister out there to assist. You don't know how this pleases me. It seems somehow as if Burns belonged to us, doesn't it, dear?

I stood to-night on the steps of the church and looked at a ray of the setting sun that was slanting between buildings and laying a finger of gold on the old dirty windows across the street till they blazed into sudden glory. As I looked the houses faded away, as they do in a moving picture, and gradually melted into a great open space that stretched a whole big block, all clear and green with thick velvety grass. There were trees in the space—a lot of them—and hammocks under some of them, with little children playing about. At the farthest end there were tennis-courts and a baseball diamond; and who do you think I saw teaching some boys to pitch, but Pat! On the other side of the street a big, old warehouse had been converted into a gymnasium with a swimming-pool.

All around that block there were model tenements, with thousands of windows; and light and air and cheerfulness. There were flowers in little beds between the curbing and the pavement, that the children could water and cultivate and pick. There was a fountain of filtered water in the center of the green, and a drinking-fountain at each corner of the block, but there wasn't a saloon in sight!

I looked around to my right, and the old stone house with its grimy face that belonged there had changed into a beautiful home with vines and flowers. There were windows everywhere jutting out with delightful unexpectedness, and just lovely green grass and more trees all the way to the corner! On the left, the old foundry had been cleansed and transformed, and had become a hospital belonging to the church. I couldn't help thinking right then and there what a grand doctor Tenny would have made if he only hadn't been an aristocrat. The hospital was all white, and there was an ambulance belonging to it, and nurses who worked not only for money, but for the love of Christ. There wasn't a doctor in it who didn't know what the Presence of God meant, or couldn't point the way to be saved to a dying sinner.

Back of the church block, in place of the old shabby factories, there was one great model factory with the best modern equipment, and the eight-hour system in full swing. No little children working for a scanty living! No tired girls and women standing all day long! No foreman that did not have a love for humanity in his soul and some kind of an idea what it was to have the Presence of the living God in a factory!

I went back to the big stone house and discovered there was a great big living-room with a grand piano at one end and a stone fireplace large enough for logs. A wide staircase led up to a gallery where many rooms opened off, rooms enough for every one we wanted, and a big special one for Father and Mother Marshall, winters, opening off in a suite, so that they could be to themselves when they got tired of us all. Of course, in summers they might want to go home sometimes and take us all with them; or maybe run down to the shore with us in an off year now and then. Break the news to them gently, darling, for I've set my heart on that house just as I saw it, and I hope they won't object.

There were other rooms, but they were vague, because I saw that you must have the key to them all yet, and I must wait till you come, to look into them.

Then I heard sweet sounds from the church, and, turning, I went in. Some one was playing the organ, high up in the dusky shadows of the gallery, and I knew it was you, Bonnie Rose, my darling! So I knelt in a pew and listened, with the Presence standing there between us. And as I knelt another vision came to me, a vision of the past! I remembered the days when I did not know God; when I sneered and argued and did all I could in my young and conceited way against him. I remembered, too, the time he came to me in my illness and I began to believe; and the day I read that verse marked in Stephen's Bible. "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." I suddenly realized that that had been made true to me. I have the witness in my own heart that Christ is the Son of God, my Saviour! That his Presence is on earth and manifest to me at many times. No seeming variance of science, no quibble of the intellect, can ever disturb this faith on which my soul rests. It is more than a conviction; it is a perfect satisfaction! I know! I may not be able to explain all mysteries, but I can never doubt again, because I know. The more I meet with modern skepticism, the more I am convinced that that is the only answer to it all: "He that doeth his will shall know of the doctrine," and that promise is fulfilled to all who have the will to believe.

All this came to me quite clearly as I knelt in the church in the sunset, while you were playing—was it "Rock of Ages"?—and a ray of the setting sun stole through the old yellow glass of the window, in the organ-loft and lay on your hair like a crown, my Bonnie darling! My heart overflowed with gratitude at the great way life has opened up to me. That I, the least of his servants, should be honored by the love of this pearl of women!

THERE was more of that letter, and Bonnie sat long on the stump reading and re-reading, with her face a glow of wonder and joy. But at last she got up and went to the house, bounding into the dining-room where Mother and Father Marshall were pretending to be busy about a lamp that didn't work.

Down she sat with her letter and read it—at least as much as we have read—to the two sad old dears who were trying so hard to get ready for loneliness. But after that there was no more sadness in that house! Father whistled everywhere he went, till Mother told him he was like a boy again. Mother sang about her work whenever she was alone. For why should they be sad any more? There were good times still going in the world, and they were in them!

"Father!" whispered Mother softly, that night, when she was supposed to be well on her way toward slumber. "Do you suppose the Lord heard us grumbling this afternoon, and sent that letter to make us ashamed of ourselves?"

"No," said Father, tenderly. "I think he just smiled to think what a big surprise he had ready for us. It doesn't pay to doubt God; it really doesn't!"

THE END

GIVEN two denominations of the same origin, the same name, the same faith, the same form of government—can they be brought together? The question really ought to be, can they be kept apart? But, as history proves, the latter is easy, the former hard.

Political questions, not affecting the faith, broke in two the Methodist Episcopal Church eighty-odd years ago, and each division has run its separate course, for twenty years in its own territory, then at close quarters in the same territory. Sectional differences, war animosities, engendered a feeling which in time abated, particularly with the rise of a new generation, to whom the bitter things of the past were not even a memory, but a fading history. Love is stronger than hate. It is as strong as God, for God is love; and it is continually saying, even under persecution, "But we be brethren." So this problem is not hopeless. The immediate issue seems to hang in the balance. Shall the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, be reunited? The reasons urging it are: both have the same doctrines, the same government, the same ritual and hymnal, the same discipline, substantially, the same practices, and they are equal heirs of the history of Methodism in America, being of the same parent stem. Moreover, each is strong in its own particular territory. The Methodist Episcopal Church is supreme in Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, New Jersey, Maryland and other states; and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Shall There Be One Methodist Church?

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

is likewise supreme in Texas, Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, the Carolinas, Tennessee and Virginia. The most important work of the northern Church in the South is not among the whites, but among the negroes, none of whom are in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

ONE church is really complementary to the other; but competition in jointly occupied territory engenders bitter feeling and acts of rivalry, and both camps are unhappy. Denominational arrogance and pride does not die in such a state of things, but justifies the dissipation of means in misdirected efforts, the waste of ministerial energy in hopeless fields, and the neglect of larger opportunities. A rising tide of opposition to this condition is evident in both churches; nevertheless, the outcome is uncertain. It is admitted that union would immensely strengthen the common cause, eliminate rivalry, waste, and bitter feeling, release men and means for larger usefulness, vastly reduce machinery and the expense of duplicated churches, boards and institutions, and immeasurably increase denominational energy and economy; yet the enterprise is halted by a barrier that may prove to be insuperable, at least for a further space of time.

The main features of the plan of union have been tentatively accepted by the Joint Commissions of twenty-five bishops, ministers and laymen of each church, as follows:

(1) Three or more Regional Conferences, each to be constituted of delegates from the Annual Conferences within its bounds, each of these quadrennial Regional Conferences to have jurisdiction over its own particular territory;

(2) A General Conference to meet at longer intervals and to have supreme jurisdiction over the whole denomination.

The number, boundaries and powers of the Regional Conferences and the composition and powers of a proposed Judicial Council are yet to be determined. The really delicate questions are involved in the composition of the General and Regional Conferences. One object of the Regional Conferences is to prevent the swallowing of the smaller, Southern, by the larger, Northern, denomination. With the bulk of the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in one Regional Conference and with each Regional Conference given equal representation in the General Conference, the supreme legislative body, the interests of the constituency of the Southern Church would be measurably secured.

BUT the greatest problem of all is what to do with the negro members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of whom there are upward of 340,000. The Church, South, has none, having organized those it had, after the Civil War, into an independent body known as the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church. The Commission of the Southern Church wants the colored brother eliminated from the proposed combination. The Northern Commission is apparently unwilling to do this.

The Southern commissioners think the ideal plan would be the consolidation of the six or seven bodies of negro Methodists in a church of their own, separate and independent of the united white body, erecting thereby a negro church of some 1,700,000 members.

This is the barrier that looms up before the Joint Commission, which is to find a way to unite two bodies with an aggregate membership of more than six and a quarter millions. It will hold its next meeting in Savannah, Ga., January 28, 1918. As the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, meets in quadrennial session in May next year, the commission will probably report conclusions or ask instructions.

The Joint Commission is composed of strong representative men, twenty-five from each church, including five bishops. The Northern Commission embraces Bishops Cranston (a strong advocate of union), Hamilton, McDowell, Leete, and Cooke; also Chancellor Day, of Syracuse University, Hon. Charles W. Fairbanks, ex-Vice-President of the United States, and Judge Henry Wade Rogers of the United States Circuit Court, New York. The Southern Commission includes Bishops Candler, Hoss, Denny, Murrah and Monzon, and well known ministers and laymen. Among the latter are five lawyers and judges.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them Into Practice.

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

WHILE wishing you, dear neighbors, all the joy of the new year—that twelve months' adventure on which we are about to embark—I cannot resist one backward glance at Christmas, nor help wondering what it brought to each of you.

You were in my thoughts on Christmas Day, and I wished that I—like the Moon in the old fairy-tale—could sail across the heavens and peep down into all your separate homes.

No doubt I would have found some sadness as well as much joy. But one thing I know: I would have found each of you, no matter how sad or anxious, extending Christmas cheer of some sort to a neighbor, a relative, a friend, or a stranger. I know this, because your unselfish Christmas letters have revealed your plans to me.

Some of those letters I have already published. Others I shall use later. One of them I am printing this week.

HERE it is: A beautiful Christmas message. And when I tell you that the writer of it is stricken with paralysis, but was so filled with love of us and the desire to share her fine experience that she penned this letter under the greatest difficulties, I know your hearts will be touched as mine was.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: As I sat thinking, a few days ago, I remembered an adventure so unusual that I knew right away I'd like the whole world to know of it.

Last Christmas we found ourselves located in a strange community, and one where nearly all were strangers to each other, and lonely.

As the holidays approached, most of us went to work, in a half-hearted way, to prepare for Christmas, but it remained for one broad-minded than the others to see and seize the opportunity to do a bit of work for the Master.

She was a busy, delicate little woman, who was caring for three babies while adjusting herself to the duties of a farm after years in the city. But she found time to send a cordial note to each neighbor, asking her to "please run over Christmas Eve, bringing husband, children and grandma to see the tree Santa brought."

When the neighbors answered their notes in person, there were thirty-five of us. We were shown into a large room, where, amid decorations of holly, mistletoe and evergreen, a huge Christmas tree spread branches of welcome. Soon sleigh bells announced the arrival of a genial Santa, who called gifts for "every good boy and girl."

Such gifts! I will mention a couple, to show the loving spirit that went with each. A certain old lady was known to suffer with chapped hands; and for her Santa had a little box of home-made hand lotion. Another neighbor had lamented the fact that she had no way of marking her butter so that purchasers could recognize it. Her gift was a butter mold, with her name upon it.

I have seen many Christmases, but never have I seen the true Christmas spirit reflected in so many faces.

With that Yuletide picture in our hearts, let us turn, for the time being, away from the joys of Christmas toward the responsibilities of this new year of ours: This 1918.

BEING in a mood for practical suggestions, as all of us undoubtedly are just now, most of us will welcome the following accounts of how other country women have solved the problem now confronting us. Is there a school in your neighborhood which is more of an eyesore than a pride? If so, read this fine letter:

Improving Our Rural School

Two young ladies started a club here on a social basis, but also with the purpose of doing all the good possible. And many are the things we have accomplished for our small community. Our state has, for the past two years, been making an appropriation for rural schools, requiring, however, that certain improvements be made on the school buildings first. We determined to get these appropriations for our school; and by means of ice-cream suppers, old-fashioned box suppers, etc., we raised money to make the needed improvements. As a result, our little neighborhood school ranked first of all the rural schools in the county, and received two of these appropriations. Now we have our school in such fine shape that we shall receive a third appropriation this next Spring!

Doesn't that letter thrill you? It did me. For that is just the kind of community spirit I glory in!

HERE is another fine instance of it:

A Chrysanthemum Show

Twenty years ago a few women in this town took it into their heads to do something to raise money in order to get better things for the town and at the same time have some clean amusement. So they settled on having a chrysanthemum show.

We sent to a greenhouse and got plants of every known variety. We cultivated them according to instructions, and in the fall we had the most magnificent display of flowers ever seen outside of a greenhouse. We cleaned out the circuit room of the courthouse, and decorated it up in fine shape. And each owner of flowers arranged her collection to suit herself. Oh, but it was beautiful!

We advertised in all the papers in the county, and the people came from far and near. "I will meet you at the 'Mum Show'" became a slogan.

The first year we cleared $125, one hundred of which we gave to our high school. We continued the show for nineteen years—until the ladies got too old to cultivate the flowers—and the young folks would not keep it up. It is said that the Chrysanthemum Show was the best thing we ever had in this town. Every year we made over a hundred dollars. Sometimes we would divide it up among the churches. Once we gave a large sum toward a five-mile stretch of railway the town was building.

Now we have taken up the old cemetery, which was all dilapidated and grown with bushes and weeds. We have hired a man at thirty dollars a month; and it looks like another place and is the pride of the town. We put up a gate with two great stone pillars; an iron gate that cost two hundred dollars.

We are not disbanded. We are still the "Mum Society." But the most we do now is to care for the cemetery. We keep a man there all the time.

You will be surprised when I tell you that the youngest member of the society is over sixty, one is ninety, two are eighty, and your correspondent is seventy-nine.

Good luck to you, dear "Mum Society"! How I wish I could interest the young folks of your town in keeping alive this ideal of yours! Oh, if only the younger generation could appreciate such precious legacies as that! These are the traditions, the inherited treasures which can (if the young folks have the vision to see and develop them) make each town just a little different from any other; give it a flavor and charm all its own.

My greetings to those dear members of the "Mum Society" who built (or helped build) a railroad with flowers! Not to mention iron gates, and stone pillars, and school buildings and a monument in the hearts of us all!

OUR next "adventure" is one that will appeal to old and young alike, and especially in the middle of winter, when good times are none too frequent. For this letters tells about

An Old-Fashioned Spelling School

To provide pleasure and mental development for everyone, little and big, our community decided, one winter, to conduct an old-fashioned spelling-school. We got a great deal of practical good and fun out of it.

It was held every two weeks, on Friday evening, in the schoolhouse. We had a good spelling-book, and the teacher announced in advance what pages of the spelling-book the words would be taken from the following Friday, thus giving everybody a chance to study the words. The more ambitious ones learned the words perfectly. Every one learned a great deal.

We met at seven-thirty, some coming great distances over rough roads. Frequently the captains were girls; sometimes a boy and a girl. First choice was settled by the captains guessing the page of a closed spelling-book, the teacher separating the pages of the book with her fingers, but not far enough for the numbers to be seen. The one guessing nearest the page number got first choice from among the spellers. Of course the best spellers were chosen first.

As soon as chosen, spellers took seats on the side with their captain. When all were chosen, each captain selected his best speller to act as "trapper." The trappers took seats in the enemy's ranks.

In order to get on rapidly, there were two pronouncers. When a word was misspelled, it was given to the trapper from the enemy's side. If he failed to spell it correctly, it was given to the trapper belonging to the side on which it was lost. If that trapper spelled it, the word was saved. If not, any one from the enemy's side was allowed to try it. If they failed, it went back to the side on which it was lost till it was spelled.

At times a great deal of interest and enthusiasm were aroused over a misspelled word, each side doing its best to spell it. Generally an hour's spelling satisfied everybody. Then we would all stand and spell down, while the trappers compared their books to see which side had missed the fewest number of words. The winning side celebrated with many shouts and hurrahs.

At the end of a fifteen minutes' recess, a literary program would be rendered. The school children were prepared by the teacher, and an invitation was extended to any one outside to participate. All were allowed to develop their talent for reading, speaking, singing, etc. Even now, memories of our spelling-school bring pleasant recollections. It created a feeling of fellowship and good will, gave us a chance to exchange ideas, and helped keep us from getting into the rut that rural people are so apt to fall into.

One very interesting feature of our program was "The Paper," which was read by the Editor. Our paper was called "The Prevaricator," and its name suggests the tone of its contents. The Editor and his assistants would glean the neighborhood for news, jokes, etc., and any one could contribute. Nothing unkind or injurious was allowed. Through its columns friends merely poked jokes and good-natured raillery at each other.

Once started, our spelling-school kept up for several winters. Some winters we substituted debating for the spelling.

I'VE had more than one chuckle over that spelling-school, with its trappers and its teasing town "Paper." I suppose the latter was a school notebook, with the items jotted down on it. And I suppose "The Editor" wore a long and impressive face when he read them, amid shrieks from his listeners.

Oh, do let us try out—some of us who have the blessed privilege of living in the country—this little "spelling-school" before the long winter is over. If any of you, living within a few hours of New York, will only do so, I will hop on a car and come out for the fun, some Friday evening.

Alas, most of you live from a half-day to a five-days' journey from my big thundering village; so I suppose I shall be cheated of my pleasure. But at least you can write me about it, which is the next best thing to my being present.

And do write me about other good times you are having this winter, so that I, in turn, can pass them on to rural communities which want to get something started in the way of good times, and don't know just what to attempt.

Before saying good-by to you for another week, I should like to express my thanks to the following letter-writers for their splendid "Adventures in Neighboring" which have reached my desk safely and will soon appear in the Department: Mrs. N. H. Weston, Mrs. A. E. Kephart, Mrs. H. W. Shenck, Miss Annie E. Shelland, Miss Rena Paul, Miss Mary Sheer, Mrs. Ed. Lovett, Mrs. Thos. E. Bell, Mrs. Florence Lockwood Lowell, Mrs. E. J. Wilbourn, E. M. B., Helen A. Hutchinson, C. C. S. C., G. T., Miss E. C. Jones. These are all the names I have space to publish this time.

There is one other important announcement I should like to make: And that is that due to the high quality of the "Adventures in Neighboring" you are sending in to us, we have decided to pay $1 instead of 50 cents for every published letter.

Until we meet again, dear neighbors, good-by, and God keep you!

And—oh, yes, I had almost forgotten: a Happy, Happy New Year!

NERVE FORCE

A keen nervous system is the most precious gift of Nature. To be dull, nervous, means to be dull, brainless, insensible to the higher things in life. In your nerves there lies your greatest strength, and there also your greatest weakness. If you are tired, depressed, nervous, irritable, cannot sleep and digest your food, it means that your nerve force is depleted.

Paul von Boeckmann, the Nerve Cultivist, has written a remarkable book which explains how to soothe, nourish and calm the nerves. Price of the book is 25 cents (coin or stamps).

If after reading this book you do not agree that it is the most valuable Health Treatise you have ever studied, return the book and your money will be refunded.

Greatest Year in World History

NINETEEN SEVENTEEN has gone, but can never be forgotten. It was a year filled with events of the first magnitude, foremost among which must be ranked our entrance as a nation into the world-war, on April 6, when President Wilson issued his proclamation recognizing the existence of a state of war between ourselves and Germany. Then came the draft, and the calling of over a million and a half of our young citizens to military service; the construction of training-camps on a vast scale; the passing of huge appropriations for war purposes; the adoption of a gigantic program of shipbuilding, including warships, destroyers, U-boat-chasers and grain-carriers; the speeding up on munition-making, and the production of cannon, machine-guns, rifles, and the various paraphernalia of modern warfare. Then followed the transportation of large detachments of our new National Army to France to join in the actual conflict, after some preliminary practical training in that country. On December 7 we declared war on Germany's ally, Austria. Toward the close of the year we had just begun to realize that we were actual participants in the international conflict, which, in the President's expressive language, we entered "to make the world safe for democracy." In the last two months of 1917, small parties of American troops came into actual conflict with the enemy on the Western front, and some casualties followed; but there had been thus far no large body of Americans engaged.

The past year will long be recalled also for the privations and self-denial our people accepted in loyally carrying out the government's pledge to supply the food and fuel shortage of our Allies. Especially will the temporary coal famine, the "wheatless and meatless days," and the phenomenal rise in the price of all the necessities of life be remembered, and all the more that these conditions continue. The Food Administration's war on profiteers, hoarders and food speculators, then initiated, still goes on with undiminished vigor, giving promise of relief soon.

Other memorable events include the passage of the War Revenue Tax Bill, a tremendous piece of legislation, affecting all classes; the great Liberty Loan, floated to "win the war"; the issuance of thrift stamps, war stamps and war stamp certificates, and the raising of vast funds for Red Cross war work, for Y. M. C. A. religious work in the camps, and for various other purposes associated with the war. Rich and poor assumed these burdens with splendidly patriotic spirit. Every demand of the government and of the various subsidiary enterprises by different organizations related to the war, was met promptly and cheerfully. Never was a nation so spontaneous and so generous at the call of patriotism. Our loans to the Allies, reaching in the billions, added largely to the volume of the nation's disbursements.

IT is not necessary to recapitulate here the leading events of the great war in 1917. They are well known to all. The destructive U-boat campaign and America's effective aid in reducing it; the Zeppelin raids on England and the terror they inspired; the mighty struggles at Verdun and Cambrai; the fighting in the Italian Alps; the threat to Venice; the collapse of imperialism in Russia, followed by the revolution and the counter-revolution, were all duly chronicled in the Christian Herald. The military debacle in Rumania scattered her forces, made her king a fugitive, and eliminated her from the list of combatants. The fall of Bagdad to the British and the capture of Jerusalem were also among the spectacular events of the year, the latter one of world-wide interest.

But why should a year be regarded solely in the light of military happenings? Fortunately, there is another aspect in which we can view 1917—an aspect that cheers and encourages. To the readers of the Christian Herald it has been a wonderful year of benevolent activities. Our Relief work has included all the great centers of suffering that could be reached, by whatever means. Our Family Circle will long remember it as the climax year of service to humanity in France, Belgium, Austria, Galicia, Poland, Servia, Syria, Armenia, Persia and Palestine, where they have sent food and help to countless multitudes, not forgetting the aid they rendered to the Belgian war refugees in England and Holland. They have also carried on with unfailing energy their other work in different lands, among the famine orphans of China, the sufferers of the great munitions explosion in Halifax, and the splendid missionary organization they helped to establish among the European prison camps, which has been productive of excellent results. They have sent their gifts and their prayers to a long list of devoted missionary workers in foreign lands, from the Arctic to the Equator and to the remote islands of the sea. And they have been mindful also of our domestic benevolences. They have sent thousands of New Testaments to the youths of our new National Army in the home camps and abroad, and the Christian Herald with them. Never before have their gifts taken so wide a range. Truly it can be said that in the year now gone their influence and kind deeds have gone out through all the earth. May He in whose name they did it add his blessing!

WE have no record of any year that was so crowded with spiritual activities as 1917. The great Reformation Anniversary Celebration was an event of prime importance. Missions were energized, both Home and Foreign; the Billy Sunday campaign in New York was a memorable event; the Gospel work in the long list of new military camps has been shared almost equally by all denominations. It has been both a sad year and a glad year. Souls have been won, hearts innumerable have been moved to deeds of sympathy and kindness, and the spirit of self-sacrifice and brotherly love has been widely inculcated. Thus, in many ways, good has come, even in the saddest year in modern history.

As in the year now closed the Christian Herald has been the mirror in which were reflected all the passing events of note throughout the world, so in the year just begun it will continue to set before its readers a faithful record of events to come; in short, it will give them all the news of the world from the Christian standpoint.

Jerusalem's Capture in the Light of Prophecy

By Prof. James M. Gray, D.D.

PROF. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.

ONE of the evidences of the widespread spiritual awakening is the new interest which is being shown in prophecy. Never have we known any series of articles to be more cordially welcomed than those now coming from the able pen of Professor James M. Gray. These contributions, which will continue for some time, deal with the great prophetic themes with the master-hand of a consecrated writer. His latest article "The Capture of Jerusalem in the Light of Prophecy," which appears in this issue of the Christian Herald, is one that will be found intensely interesting and illuminating also. Dr. Gray is neither controversial nor dogmatic. He studies the word with reverence and sets forth his interpretation in the spirit of inspiration. He shows convincingly that we are living in the days of prophetic fulfilment. His expositions include almost every vital question that has arisen in the minds of thoughtful readers who have given serious study to the Scriptures. What are those vital questions? Here are some of them:

- | | |
|--|---|
| Who is Antichrist? | What of the Parousia? |
| What is meant by "The Kingdom"? | What of the Resurrection? |
| What is the Restoration and when? | Are the Anglo-Saxon nations identified in Prophecy? |
| What is the Restitution? | What is the "End of the Age"? |
| Is Germany an agent in Prophecy? | How is the present war related to Prophecy? |
| Is Russia identified in Prophecy? | Has the United States a place in Prophecy? |
| Is Turkey assigned a role in Prophecy? | What is the true teaching concerning the Second Coming? |
| Is this War to end in Armageddon? | Which nation or power is prophetic Babylon? |
| When will the "Times of the Gentiles" end? | |
| When will the Lost Tribes return? | |
| What shall be the fate of Papal Rome? | |
| What of the Millennium and when? | |

These are only a few of the many questions that arise in prophetic study. Dr. Gray will deal ably and clearly with them in forthcoming issues of the Christian Herald.

Only the Best of Fiction

REV. CHAS. M. SHELDON, D.D.
Pastor-Author of "In His Steps"

NOT being impelled to publish fiction in large quantity, we are free to select only the very best. "Howard Chase," by Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, will tighten its grip as it unfolds its social and religious riches. Following it, will come the best serial procurable at the time. The whole field of fiction production is always being carefully searched by the Christian Herald for the peculiarly high class stories demanded by our readers.

The same wide search and careful selection keep the Christian Herald Short Stories ever up to the top-notch of excellence. In hand, for publication during the year, are several Short Stories with rare power to uplift as well as entertain.

Whatever You Want to Know

SOUNDS like a big contract, but the Christian Herald is now prepared to fill it and to fill it promptly at no cost to the questioner except a three-cent stamp.

The Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C., is now ready, and will be always ready to serve our readers, and to give you, quickly, completely and compactly, facts or reports or explanations about which you need information. The Bureau has access to all the treasures of the reference libraries and museums of the Capital. It has intimate working arrangements with Government Departments. It can get easily and quickly, because it knows where to go for it, information which it would be difficult to secure from any other source. It specializes in information; that is its business.

So whether it is a matter of food, of planting, of labor, of machinery, of manufacturing, of purchasing, of selling, of saving, of insurance, of military service, of legislation, of history, of biography, of co-operation, of capital or of labor, whatever it is, write it clearly in pen and ink and enclose a three-cent stamp to Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Christian Herald Information Bureau, Washington, D. C.

CAP'N ABE, STOREKEEPER A CAPE COD STORY

By JAMES A. COOPER

DO you like to read about doings on Cape Cod, among the quaint characters who inhabit that locality? Would you like to read of what happened to a high-bred city girl when she suddenly landed down there to take up her living with a relative she had never seen? Would you like to read how loquacious Cap'n Abe, the storekeeper, who could tell more marvelous yarns than any other man on the Cape, suddenly disappeared, and of how his brother from "furrin parts" appeared to take his place?

Would you like to read about a most perplexing mystery that came near being turned into a tragedy, and of how a man who was a rank coward at heart forced himself to play the part of a hero? In this volume, humor and pathos are well mixed. Many of the doings along the Cape shore are taken from life. Tender love scenes are not lacking; and there is high excitement when a great storm wrecks a vessel off the coast and it looks as if some of the loved ones might be drowned. To meet Cap'n Abe is never to forget him.

We will send a copy of "Cap'n Abe, Storekeeper," postpaid, $2.50 together with the Christian Herald for one year, for

SONG STORIES OF THE SAWDUST TRAIL

By HOMER RODEHEAVER, Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

HOMER RODEHEAVER, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," to which Billy has furnished this glowing preface:

"It is a pleasure to endorse the songs of Homer Rodeheaver. They have reclaimed, and redeemed, and remade the lives of thousands of men and women. The effort to tell, in human story form, the experiences of new birth that have resulted from these songs in his book, 'The Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail,' should do a tremendous service for the Kingdom."

"W. A. SUNDAY."

"Rody" in his book tells the story of his most favorite songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing the four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. He relates how another song, "My Father Watches Over Me," sung at a mission service, called a poor, sin-sick criminal and wanderer back to Christ and happiness. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups and his evil associates, to his wife and family, and tells how all his former happiness was restored.

There are many other songs, each of which Rodeheaver invests with a history of its own. Among them are "Counting the Cost," "If Your Heart Keeps Right," "Mother's Prayers," "Sweeter As the Years Go By," and "I Walk with the King." One that has a unique history is "The Brewers' Big Horses"—the simplest and homeliest of the lot, and the most amusing. You'll laugh with delight as you read how the brewers' horses and their driver, under orders from the brewers themselves, did actually try to break up a parade given in honor of the evangelist, and what happened.

We will send a copy of "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," postpaid, $2.40 together with the Christian Herald for one year, for

After Death, What?

By
REV. MADISON C. PETERS

WHEN the late Dr. Klopsch published "After Death, What?" some years ago, the book was received with tremendous enthusiasm and the editions published by him were soon exhausted. Successive editions were not published, yet the demand through the intervening years has been large. For this reason we have thought it wise to bring out an entirely new edition of this wonderful book.

It is impossible to give more than the briefest glimpses of the rich character of the contents of this attractive volume. Among the subjects discussed are: "Does Death End All?" "Light After Darkness,"

"The Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "Heavenly Reunions," "The Joy and Comfort of Faith in Immortality," "Occupations in Heaven," "Our Children in Heaven," and many others, including poems of comfort and master minds on the life beyond. In addition to the above masterpieces of thought and literature, it contains a vast collection of golden gems from the greatest historians, philosophers, preachers and poets of all ages and nationalities on other phases of the future life.

Whether Dr. Madison C. Peters, the author, has looked into heaven with his own eyes we know not; but in this substantial and handsome volume he sees and makes his readers see the beauties of the cloudless land.

Uncle Sam's Advice to Housewives TWO SPLENDID VOLUMES

Written by United States Government experts telling you how to prepare better food at the cheapest possible cost. Approved by the United States Department of Agriculture and the United States Food Administration.

FOR many years the United States Government has been employing experts to study the most economical methods of preparing foods with a view to telling the housewives all over the country how to get better and tastier food for less money.

The result of these investigations has been printed in pamphlets issued by the Government. But no general collection has ever been made until this one, which has the approval of the United States Department of Agriculture and of Herbert Hoover's Food Administration.

If any housewife will carefully read these volumes she will not only be able to save money and provide better food for her own household, but she will be directly helping the United States Government in its endeavor to conserve the food resources of the nation.

Vital Human Stories From Russia

MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

CORRESPONDENTS, like poets, are born, not made. Maynard Owen Williams, whose articles appear exclusively in the Christian Herald, has the born correspondent's ability to observe and the capacity to understand something of the genius of the people among whom he is. More than that, he has the sympathetic attitude of a sincere Christian, and a vital Christian love for truth. Having observed and understood, he can so tell it that the rest of us also see and understand.

Do you want to know how the Russian Church, deprived of the protection of autocracy, is meeting the challenge of democracy? Williams will tell you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to see the Great Russian Council, yet to be called, build a people's government on the shattered foundations of a Czar's authority? Williams will show you in the Christian Herald.

Do you want to understand the mind and heart of the Slav, feared as a menace by so many generations of western Europeans, now leading them all in his devotion to liberty and the rights of men? Williams will make it plain in the Christian Herald.

At the time of the Russian Revolution, Mr. Williams was in China completing his articles about the Orient for the Christian Herald. He went to Petrograd at once. From Harbin, the far Eastern port, Mr. Williams sent several articles which have helped the readers of the Christian Herald to understand the new Russia.

The Church and the "Movie"

THAT a form of recreation which appeals to 10,000,000 persons daily should have far-reaching influence is self-evident. The movie is directly affecting the home, the press, the pulpit, and the school, either beneficially or adversely. The movie has established itself to stay and must be resolutely reckoned with as one of the greatest forces of modern life for morality or immorality, for uplift or debasement. There are two ways of converting the movie to spiritual helpfulness. One is by introducing practical religious spirit into the movie, and the other is by adapting the pulling and educative powers of the movie to the Church and Sunday School. How these reforms may be accomplished with best results is a question with which many fertile minds are busy. Experiments are being made on extensive scale and many plans are being tested out. It is a matter of grave moment to the churches. The Christian Herald will present the possibilities in their various aspects, as seen by experts. Practical methods for the adaptation of the movie to effective religious work will undoubtedly be worked out. It is a movement with which every Christian worker is in sympathy and will wish to be in touch.

The Greater United States

FRANK G. CARPENTER

IN every Chautauqua Association and in nearly every town and village of the United States Frank G. Carpenter is known as the man who can come back from some place and then tell about it so that you think you have been there. After going into all the odd corners of the world, Mr. Carpenter has now turned his steps toward the farms and factories of his native land. Already he has told stories in the Christian Herald of steel and cotton, of sugar and of sulphur, of oil and lumber, and he has only just made a beginning. This exceedingly interesting series of articles, under the title of the Greater United States, appears regularly in the Christian Herald.

Mr. Carpenter is making studies of our farms, factories, and mines from the standpoint of efficiency and industrial preparedness, and will make careful investigations of the wealth and resources of the United States, telling in the Christian Herald how they may be mobilized in times of need.

The aim of these travels is to learn just what we have in resources and industry, and how they may be protected, developed, and made most efficient for the American people.

Mr. Carpenter is making extensive travels throughout the United States, covering the great agricultural and industrial centers. He is taking up the great industries and is showing the new things that are taking place in them, especially drugs, dyes, etc. These articles deal with New England, with the newest South with its iron and sulphur, cotton and chemicals, and with the bread and meat lands of the Mississippi Valley. He will show what is going on in and about the Great Lakes, including the vast iron mines on which our manufacturing industry is founded.

Mr. Carpenter will visit and tell about the fast-growing Southwest, the Northwest and the Pacific Slope.

War Temperance Activities

WHEN Dr. Francis E. Clark chose Dr. Daniel A. Poling as his right-hand man and slated him for the future leadership of the world-wide Christian Endeavor organization, he chose wisely. Dr. Poling goes to Europe in a few days for a stay of several months. He will visit the warring countries, and has consented to write his impressions in a series of letters to be published exclusively in the Christian Herald. In a letter just received he shows his appreciation of his new audience in these words—"Let me express to you, on behalf of the United Committee on War Temperance Activities in the Army and Navy, the gratitude we all feel for your splendid support in connection with this campaign. The Christian Herald has never failed any worthy cause."

THE COMPLETE DRESSMAKER AND HOME MILLINER

EVERY woman wants to be well dressed. How many times have you said "I wish I could make my own clothes"! The necessity of knowing how to make one's own dresses and hats is becoming more evident every day. Learn to make your own dresses and you will have more dresses and better material and for less money than ever before. This home dressmaking course is by Mary I. McIntyre, Instructor of Professional Dressmaking at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y., one of the most successful schools of Domestic Science and Arts in this country. The home millinery course, which is also included, is by Mme. Anna Ben-Yusuf, Instructor of Millinery at Pratt Institute.

Bear in mind these courses do not deal with styles. They show in simple language and clear illustrations how to fashion your frock or suit or hat along the most modish lines.

"KING ALCOHOL DETHRONED" DR. FERDINAND C. IGLEHART

DR. IGLEHART'S book tells the whole story of the nation's revolt against Drink, from the beginning up to the present time. It is a masterly presentation, so complete in every detail that it is equivalent to a whole library on the subject. He has enlisted the aid of the men who are foremost today in all the sciences, and in every leading line of business, in setting forth the successive steps through which our nation is becoming emancipated from strong drink. There is hardly an American of prominence in any line of activity, hardly a name that carries weight in legislation or on the public platform, nor yet a single writer of ability in dealing with the subject, who has not made personal contributions to this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "King Alcohol Dethroned," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $240

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $200

THE PICTORIAL LIFE OF CHRIST

EIGHTY magnificent sculptural illustrations by the famous Italian master-sculptor, Domenico Mastroianni, who has "imbibed the very spirit of the Holy Land." In his scenes, every figure stands out with vivid distinctness and almost startling clearness of detail. The characters, postures, and surroundings are those of Nazareth and Jerusalem. We see the Saviour himself—a commanding figure of royal dignity blended with divine pity, yet withal intensely human—"in all things as we are."

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels.

We will send a copy of "The Pictorial Life of Christ," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $225

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $200

THE WICKED JOHN GOODE

FEW autobiographies published in recent years and dealing with the miracle of grace which transforms the heart and life of the sinner have attracted more attention or elicited more cordial approval than "The Wicked John Goode."

The very brutality, the seemingly hopeless criminality, in the life of this man, ending at last in his regeneration and the wonderful work he is now doing, stamp the tale as most remarkable.

It is our wish that every Christian person be made acquainted with the contents of this book. We have already received hundreds of letters of commendation, and many persons are buying the book to present it to others.

We will send a copy of "The Wicked John Goode," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $235

Margaret E. Sangster's Department

THE SINGER IN THE SUNSHINE

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"Sunshine in the morning,
When songs are all unsung;
When Life is all before us,
And all the world is young."

This stanza, from one of her own poems, is the keynote to Margaret Sangster's philosophy of life. She is the interpreter of the pure Joy of Living, and there is the fragrance of woodlands and gardens, the hint of birdsongs and sunbeams and wholesome pleasures in all she writes.

Margaret Sangster has made friends of the entire Christian Herald Family Circle. She is the counsellor of young folks without number and of a good many who are still youthful in heart although the years may creep on apace; for she has the spirit of kindness and sympathy in large measure in all she says and writes and thinks. Her page on is an open forum for the sex, in which they discuss with absolute freedom intimate home and personal problems, whether they deal with conduct, friendships, amusements, or the things that belong to the deeper philosophy of life. She has a wise head on young shoulders and seems to possess in extraordinary measure the gift of touching the secret heart-strings.

As an organizer in all kinds of feminine enterprises we do not know her equal. During the coming year Miss Sangster's department will be one of the foremost in varied human interest. She has many projects in view which will surprise and delight readers of the Christian Herald. A few of these topics we are privileged to mention:

"Stories of Girls Who Have Made Good in Business and the Home,"
"Women and the War,"
"The Slums of the City," and many short stories.

THE CHURCH AFTER THE WAR

A NOTABLE Symposium of religious Leaders of all denominations. Following closely after the Pittsburgh Congress which sounded the Keynote of the Church's opportunity for regaining its spiritual influence throughout the world, these expressions from many Americans distinguished in the religious and social life of the nation will be read with intense interest. They will doubtless evoke much comment from our readers and will stimulate discussion on this topic. Among the contributors are Professor David Starr Jordan of Leland Stanford University; W. R. Moody, head of the Training School at Northfield; Rev. Charles D. Jefferson of New York; Bishop Quayle, one of the most eloquent of living Methodist leaders; Junius Remensnyder, foremost among Lutheran theologians, and many others.

VERA L. CONNOLLY

MISS CONNOLLY is a writer who, after living in the country for years, is now exiled to the city by the demands of her work. Her heart is still in the country, however, as are many of the friends and associations she holds most dear.

It is just because she knows and loves country life, its joys and trials, its problems, and the way in which plucky rural women have solved them for the good of the community, that she believes a frank exchange of experiences between such rural women—those who have helped to make their village or farm community a better and happier place to live in—to be worth while for us all. The editors of the Christian Herald agree with her; this purpose, conducted by Miss Connolly, under and so a new department for the homey title of

"Adventures in Neighboring," appears regularly in the Christian Herald

To this department every rural subscriber of the Christian Herald is invited to contribute her own most inspiring "Adventures in Neighboring." The most helpful of these letters will be paid for and published. And it is the hope of Miss Connolly that every thrilling and profitable adventure on which any rural community (led by its women) has embarked, from the giving of a community pageant to the planting of trees on a village street, will be described here for the encouragement and inspiration of country women everywhere.

OTHER SPLENDID FEATURES

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing something more than merely placing interesting reading matter in the homes of its readers. It is giving them a part in a great enterprise; it is giving them spiritual and material helpfulness. It is the one magazine that represents, in the most vital way, all of the interests of Protestant Christianity and of the onmarching Church of Christ. Week after week the Christian Herald is giving its readers issues of absorbing interest.

Weekly sermons, each week by a distinguished pastor.

Meditations, one for each day in the week. Dr. J. H. Jowett contributes the one for Sunday reading. The others are contributed by well-known pastors.

International Sunday School Lesson by Dr. Allison.

Young People's Societies: Epworth League, Christian Endeavor, Baptist Young People's Union; outlined by experts.

Weekly double page of illustrations.

Review of the news of the week the world over.

The Bible and Newspaper, by Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart.

Splendid editorials on questions of the day.

Spiritual work in the Camps.

Bible lands in the War: what has happened in these lands will be told in the Christian Herald.

The Church and the War: a great and vital question for all Christians.

SECOND BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

BEST VERSES FOR THE 60 PICTURES

As Selected by the Committee of Judges

These Are the Winning Verses from Which Participants in the Second Study Will Now Check Up Their Answers

IN this and the three following pages we publish the best verses for the 60 pictures of the SECOND Bible Picture Study, which ended some months ago.

These verses are those designated BEST by the eminent Committee of Judges, who have just handed in their decisions. From these verses participants in the Second Study will now mark their scores, and send the results in to us. We will compare the checking results with the sets of verses which the participants submitted, and we hope to announce within a short time which participants have won the 1,000 cash prizes, totaling $5,628.00.

How You Will Check Up Your Answers

In the columns of the Christian Herald and in the Answer Book participants in the Second Bible Picture Study were told to make a duplicate record, by Book, Chapter number and Verse number, of the verses they were submitting, and to keep this record at home. So all participants in the Second Study have this record, which they will now produce from whatever safe place in which they have been keeping it.

Participants were also told to cut out and keep at home the Checking Sheet which appeared in the Answer Books, and if they did not compete with the Answer Book, to send in to us for a Checking Sheet. Now produce these Checking Sheets also.

Placing your record of verses submitted and your Checking Sheet on the table in front of you, turn your attention to the 60 pictures shown here and especially to the BEST verses for them. The best verse or verses for each picture appears directly beneath it. Following each verse is its Book, Chapter number and Verse number.

First of all you will notice that in some cases the Judges were unable to choose between two or more verses which they considered equally best for a picture, so they designated each of the two or more verses as best for that picture. You will receive credit, in such a case, for as many of the best verses as you submitted for that picture.

Now look beneath picture No. 1, and you will see that three best verses were named for it. Look at your record of the answers you submitted for picture No. 1. Did you submit all three best verses? If so, write down the figure 3 on your Checking Sheet, in the column headed "Number Correct," opposite where it says "No. 1." Did you submit two of the best verses? If so, write down the figure 2 there. Did you submit one of the best verses? If so, write down the figure 1 there. Did you fail to submit any of the best verses? If so, make no notation at all in the "Number Correct" column. But don't forget the "Number Incorrect" column on the Checking Sheet. Did you submit any verse or verses for picture No. 1 which are not best ones? If so, write the number of incorrect verses down in the "Number Incorrect" column, on the same line where it says "No. 1." If you submitted only correct verses, and did not submit any incorrect ones at all, make no notation whatever in the "Number Incorrect" column.

And the Other 59 Pictures

Next turn your attention to picture No. 2, and notice that the Judges named two best verses for it. Look at your record of submitted verses, and see if you submitted one of these best verses for picture No. 2, or both of them, or no best verses at all. See also if you submitted any incorrect verses. Mark the result down on your Checking Sheet on the same line with where it says "No. 2."

Then take up picture No. 3, and see if you submitted the best verse for it, and if you submitted any incorrect ones. Mark the result down on your Checking Sheet.

Continue your comparison carefully all through the 60 pictures, until you have filled out your Checking Sheet correctly for every one of the pictures.

Remember that the verses you submitted for a picture apply to that picture only.

Having filled out the score for all 60 pictures, lastly add up the number of correct verses you submitted, the number of incorrect, and the total number. Write down each total on the proper line at the foot of the Checking Sheet, and finally sign your name and address. Then seal the Checking Sheet in an envelope, and address the envelope as follows: Second Bible Picture Study, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Picture No. 1. And he said, Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah: and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of. Gen. 22:2

And Isaac spake unto Abraham his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I, my son. And he said, Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt offering? Gen. 22:7

And Abraham said, My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering: so they went both of them together. Gen. 22:8

Picture No. 2.—Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet and turn again and rend you. Matt. 7:6

As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion. Prov. 11:22

Picture No. 3. Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. Matt. 25:1

Picture No. 4. Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares. Heb. 13:2

Watch ye therefore: for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning. Mark 13:34

Picture No. 5. Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation: lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass. Zech. 9:9

Picture No. 6. Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. Ex. 15:1

Picture No. 7. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind. Matt. 13:17

Picture No. 8. And being in Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard very precious: and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. Mark 14:3

Picture No. 9. And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden: and there he put the man whom he had formed. Gen. 2:8

And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat:

Gen. 2:16

And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life: Gen. 3:14

Picture No. 10. Goto the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: Prov. 6:6

Picture No. 11. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. 1 Cor. 15:53

O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? 1 Cor. 15:55

Picture No. 12. Canst thou draw out leviathan with a hook? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? Job 41:1

Picture No. 13. Behold, we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us, and we turn about their whole body. James 3:3

He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men. Job 39:21

Winning Verses in the Second Bible Picture Study

Picture No. 14. For the bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in. Isa. 28: 20.

Picture No. 19. So he arose and went to Zerephath. And when he came to the gate of the city, behold, the widow woman was there gathering sticks; and he called to her, and said, Fetch me, I pray thee, a little water in a vessel, that I may drink. 1 Kings 17: 10.

Picture No. 22. He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppression, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil; Isa. 33: 15.

Picture No. 25. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. Ex. 20: 4. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; Ex. 20: 5.

Picture No. 28. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock. Matt. 7: 26. And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell; and great was the fall of it. Matt. 7: 27.

Picture No. 15. For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope; for a living dog is better than a dead lion. Eccles. 9: 4.

Picture No. 16. And they shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. Isa. 2: 19.

Picture No. 17. And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. Isa. 40: 5.

Picture No. 18. Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. Eph. 6: 11.

Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. Eph. 6: 13. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness; Eph. 6: 14. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; Eph. 6: 17.

An Object Lesson

Just for an example of how a participant should fill out the Checking Sheet, let us suppose that he finds, on looking at his record of the verses he submitted, that he submitted one best verse for picture No. 1 and one verse that is not best. Then he would mark the result on the Checking Sheet just as you see this sample one filled out here for the first picture.

Suppose he submitted both the best verses for picture No. 2, and submitted three incorrect ones for it. Then he would fill out his Checking Sheet as you see this sample one filled out here for the second picture.

Suppose he submitted the one best verse and no incorrect ones at all for picture No. 3. Then he would fill out his Checking Sheet as you see this sample one filled out here for the third picture.

Suppose he submitted one of the best verses and two incorrect verses for picture No. 4.

Then he would fill out his Checking Sheet as you see this sample one filled out here for the fourth picture.

Suppose he did not submit the best verse for picture No. 5, and submitted one incorrect verse for it. Then he would fill out his Checking Sheet as you see this sample one filled out here for the fifth picture.

And so on. We tore off the bottom of this sample Checking Sheet before making a reproduction of it for insertion here, but of course the participant would go on filling out his, standing for all 60 pictures, then add up the totals, mark them down, sign name and address, and send the Checking Sheet in to us.

Again we remind you: Do not credit yourself with any best verse chosen by the Judges unless you submitted that verse for the same picture for which the Judges pronounced it best.

THIS IS YOUR CHECKING SHEET

Don't Lose It!

Keep it safely with your duplicate record of verses. When the official list of "best" (correct) verses, as designated by the Judges, appears in the Christian Herald, compare it with your duplicate record of answers. Write down the results here. Follow directions in our published announcements as to sending this in. Write the same number that is on this sheet also on your set of answers before sending them in.

Picture No. 23. Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? then may ye also do good, that are accustomed to do evil. Jer. 13: 23.

Picture No. 26. If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are. 1 Cor. 3: 17. Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine inflame them! Isa. 5: 11.

Picture No. 31. Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat. Matt. 7: 13. Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. Matt. 7: 14.

Picture No. 21. He that spareth his rod hateth his son; but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes. Prov. 13: 24. Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying. Prov. 19: 18. The rod and reproof give wisdom; but a child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame. Prov. 29: 15.

Picture No. 24. And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing. Mark 12: 42. And he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast more in, than all they which have cast into the treasury: Mark 12: 43.

Picture No. 27. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. Psa. 23: 1. He restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Psa. 23: 3.

Picture No. 32. Wherefore if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into everlasting fire. Matt. 18: 8.

Winning Verses in the Second Bible Picture Study

Picture No. 33. Then was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. Matt. 4:1.

Picture No. 38. And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. Isa. 2:2.
And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. Isa. 2:3.

Picture No. 41. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever. Dan. 12:3.
In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. Gen. 1:1.

Picture No. 44. For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the Lord shall reward thee. Prov. 25:22.
Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink, for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Rom. 12:20.

Picture No. 47. A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast; but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. Prov. 12:10.

Picture No. 34. And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: Matt. 6:28.

And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Matt. 6:29.

Picture No. 35. And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God. Luke 9:62.

Picture No. 36. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. Josh. 1:8.

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. Psa. 119:105.

Picture No. 37. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. Deut. 25:14.
But thou shalt have a perfect and a just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. Deut. 25:15.

DANIEL HOFFMAN MARTIN, D.D., Pastor of Fort Washington Presbyterian Church, New York

Picture No. 39. And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. Mark 10:44.
For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many. Mark 10:45.

Picture No. 42. My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. James 2:1.
Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God: I am the Lord. Lev. 19:32.

Picture No. 45. Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice: Eph. 4:31.
Thou shalt not kill. Ex. 20:13.
Cease from anger, and forsake wrath: fret not thyself in any wise to do evil. Ps. 37:8.

Picture No. 50. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God. Gen. 17:8.

Picture No. 40. And he had in his hand a little book open; and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth. Rev. 10:2.
And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven. Rev. 10:5.

Picture No. 43. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father? Matt. 10:29.

Picture No. 46. The sea is come up upon Babylon: she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof. Jer. 51:42.

Picture No. 51. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. Matt. 24:31.
And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound. Rev. 8:6.

Jesus Begins His Work

Mark 1:12-20

How Jesus Faced His Task

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

HAVING briefly stated the place of Jesus in preparing the way for the "Mightier One" of whom he spoke, Mark hastens on to show us Jesus beginning his work. In just two sentences (verses 12, 13) he shows us the soul-battlefield upon which Jesus faced his task and his temptations, and then and there decided upon the course of his life-work. Mark leaves us with the impression that these things never perplexed Jesus again. He faced them at the outset and settled them once for all, there in the wilderness of Judea.

After the high spiritual experience of Jesus at his baptism, came the season of heart-searching alone. After every man's lofty resolves and solemn self-dedication comes the period of doubts and misgivings. Jesus underwent this test, and was "in all points tempted like as we are."

Notice how vividly this master-artist Mark pictures the spiritual testing-ground. The wilderness. No human helpers at hand; the fact that each and every man must in a real sense face the issues of life as he must face death, alone. Tempted of Satan. The actual, indubitable fact of the presence of dangerous, predatory evil in the world which assaults even the strongest soul. Jesus would not have been a "Son of Man" without this. Wild beasts. With their horrid howlings at night and their genuine menace to the physical safety of the lonely Man. And angels. The unseen spiritual ministrants of the Father in heaven.

I Overcoming Temptations

This is the sub-topic for Junior and Intermediate classes, and practical enough for us all. Today we are asked to add in this department, the following Scriptures to the lesson-text in Mark: Matt. 4:1-11, 1 Cor. 10:13 and Heb. 2:18. These bring home to us first of all that Jesus was really tempted and had to fight and struggle to win, so that he is indeed sympathetic and worthy to be the Captain of our salvation. There is strength available for us in our victorious leader. And in the second place, Paul's word of encouragement that no temptation is unbearable, for God is always able to make for us a way by which we may be able to endure it.

The three temptations mentioned in the fourth chapter of Matthew are those which beset good men rather than the wicked.

(a) To avoid suffering and hardship by using his powers for his own immediate benefit. It seemed reasonable in his hunger to demand bread as a right; but he had gone there on purpose to fast. We are all too likely to forget our first purpose, when there comes the natural desire to gratify our own appetites and pleasures. The temptation comes to us in far grosser forms than it did to our Master. But it was real to him. So something whispers in our ears, "But you must look out for Number One," when we are on the verge of the Kingdom of Unselfishness. We must meet it as Jesus did. Whom are we really working for, God or Self?

(b) To take a spectacular method of showing our faith in God. This goes with all forms of presumptuousness in religion, ostentatious giving, flaunting our godliness to be seen of men. In Jesus it came in subtle guise, the temptation to test God and impress men by foolhardy ventures in the name of trust in God.

(c) To do evil that good may come. Alas, there are so many who try to do God's work in wrong ways! Remember Moses' first venture in helping the distressed brickmakers. He murdered one of the cruel taskmasters! Afterward he learned the long and patient way of the exodus and the desert journey.

Jesus rejected the Satanic suggestion of compromising his principles for a success that would only be temporary.

Two Weapons of the Soul

With the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, Jesus parried each thrust of the enemy and gave blow for blow. A familiarity with the mighty truths of the Bible is both sword and shield to a believer. If you are tempted or perplexed by a text used to promote something from which your conscience and judgment recoil, you may be sure it is wrongly used. Search further and you will find it outweighed by another.

The other weapon of the soul is more intangible than mastery of the Scriptures. It is what Jesus called the will to do God's will, and which we call personal consecration. Wholesouled consecration brings all things to this touchstone. Is this his will? With his strength we are not too weak and must never repine. Neither are we ever so strong that we need him not. "I can do all things," said the apostle. "How?" we ask. His answer comes, "Through Christ who strengtheneth me."

II Jesus Facing His Task

This is our Senior and Adult class topic. We have as additional material Matt. 4:1-11, Heb. 4:14-16 and John 4:34-38. We ought to gain from this angle of our theme some practical help for facing our tasks, whether of teaching God's children, or bearing our burdens, or doing our daily work to the glory of God. Jesus seems to have been confronted with three problems in his special ministry as the Redeemer from sin.

1. Deciding his Methods. How should the Messiah go about his appointed work? By the popular and easy way of spectacular appeal and an earthly kingdom, which was the earnest expectation of the Jews and would have produced remarkable results with such a leader? Or by the long, slow, patient way of teaching spiritual truths to common men, and waiting for the Lord of the harvest to prosper it through sun and storm? You know his decision, adopted at the start in the wilderness meditation and never changed.

2. Ascertaining his Message. What should be the keynote of his message? Could he use and adapt familiar ideas, or should he take strong new expressions concerning the deep things of God? Jesus humbly chose to take what the prophets and John had given Israel and to transfigure their phrases with new power and meaning. He called for humility and repentance to clear the way for the coming of the Kingdom of God. It was an old, old message, but on his lips it came as something wondrously compelling. Socially and practically he may be said to have summed up his doctrine in "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."

3. Securing Helpers. With all his powers Jesus never for a moment imagined he could do his work alone. The very essence of Christianity lies in teamwork for spiritual ends. God wants human cooperation. So when Jesus had decided upon his methods and determined the chief emphasis of his message he went forth to begin the Galilean ministry and began to enlist disciples. It is significant that he found them among the men he knew best: fishermen and workers of Capernaum and the neighboring towns. He took with him the common men who were open-hearted and practical-minded to a degree. We make a big mistake if we think the twelve started in by being theologians!

We realize that we face tasks, big hard tasks, with this New Year 1918. When we are tempted and tried, or perchance grow weary, be assured that Jesus' compassion is ready and that he can help, for he knows the whole difficult journey of them that serve. But rejoice that you have work to do, and that the promises of power are yours. Above all, do not say there is nothing you can do. The harvest is white, promising satisfying wages and the joy of gathering fruit unto life eternal.

HERE are the first eight pictures of the National Bible Picture Study. Can you think of a Bible verse which each picture illustrates? Couldn't you find a suitable verse for each picture, if you had a short reference list of only about 2,000 verses from which to select? $5,000 in cash will be awarded the 1,001 persons who select the best verses for the thirty Study Pictures. In looking at the pictures, finding applicable verses for them, and writing down your selections you will be learning about the Bible in a fascinating way that will impress the verses, their beauties and truths, everlastingly upon your memory. Give some of your idle winter evenings to this simple yet absorbing Bible competition. It will delight and inspire you—and it may give you a fine cash reward.

You Will Be Surprised to find how keenly you will enter into the interesting Study. It will become your favorite amusement, and your greatest source of comfort and encouragement. One of the participants in a former Picture Study, given last year by the Christian Herald, wrote: "Those who have not been in the contest have lost a great deal." Another said: "It has been a work of love and not of labor." A third wrote: "It has been both an interesting and instructive study to me—God's promises and love made clearer, to increase my faith and trust."

These are but a few of the thousands of appreciative letters, and when you have entered this third and greatest Study you will feel as delighted as these happy friends. Think: Can you call to mind any way in which you may employ your spare moments to better advantage than in this home competition, in which the rewards are so many and so certain?

will appear in the Christian Herald, and in securing your Outfit now you may obtain the pictures which have appeared to date—indeed, they are all shown you, in somewhat smaller size, on this page. The ninth picture will be printed next week, and all thirty will appear during the next nine weeks. Of course you will hereafter secure the balance of the thirty pictures from the Christian Herald as it comes to you each week. We guarantee that every one starting now will get every one of the thirty pictures.

The Study is just beginning—start now while there is plenty of time to give your best thought and judgment to the selection of the best verses for the pictures. You are not by any means asked to search the entire Bible—no verses will be accepted as answers except those found among the 2,000 which are gathered in the official Reference Book, called International Bible Readings. Competition in the Study without expense is made possible under our rules, which are sent free upon request. Read about the handy complete Outfit below, and then send for your own Outfit, and become one of our happy participants!

COMPLETE OUTFIT

To the left is International Bible Readings, the Reference Book of about 2,000 Bible verses. From these verses all must choose their best verses for the thirty pictures. Verses not found in the official list cannot be accepted as answers.

To the right is the Answer Book, in which participants will write down and submit their chosen verses for the pictures.

International Bible Readings is not only the Reference Book for the Picture Study—it is also a very valuable book in itself, to be treasured long after the Study has ended. It is composed of the Bible verses which make up the International Sunday School Lessons, Daily Home Bible Readings and Golden Texts for December, 1917.

Not to Be Sorry

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THEY told me, not long ago, that a friend of mine was dead. It had been quite sudden, his death, for I had seen him radiantly happy and healthy only a week before the news came to me. And as I sat wondering a bit about the mystery of life, I found that one thought kept recurring to me. For I kept asking myself:

"Was I ever unkind or unfair to him? Did I ever doubt his word or believe the words of other people against him? Did I ever quite consciously hurt him?"

I found myself glad that I had listened many an hour to the story of his ambitions. I found myself glad of a long walk that we had taken together—a walk I had been regretting because of the blister it made on my heel. I found myself glad of the small pleasant things that I had sometimes said to him—of a verse or two that I had written. I found myself glad that our friendship had been a pleasant one. For now they told me he was dead.

ONCE heard a girl talking to her mother. "I'm so angry at Estelle," she said, "that I'll never speak to her again."

"Why not?" questioned the mother. "Because," said the girl, "she hurt my feelings, and I shall never forgive her!"

"My dear," said the mother very gently, "my dear, you must never talk about not forgiving. You must never say that you're too angry at a person to get over it. You must never even say 'never'—in regard to breaking a friendship or hurting some one! I had a friend once who became as angry at me as you are at Estelle. She said she didn't want to be my friend any more. She even passed me on the street without speaking to me, and my very young heart—I was only a girl then—was about broken."

"And then all at once I grew very ill, and they sent me to the hospital, and my family and the doctor didn't think that I would live. And I hung between this world and That Other One for days."

"I came out of a mist of unconsciousness weeks later. The first thing I noticed, I think, was a sheaf of pink roses in a vase by my bed. 'Who,' I asked weakly, 'sent them?' and 'A girl friend of yours,' my nurse told me."

"As soon as I was well enough to see visitors she came. She looked ill, too, as if she had been worried and unhappy—as if she, too, had come to a parting-place. I shall never forget her expression as she knelt at my bedside. 'I was afraid,' she sobbed, 'that you could never get well. I was afraid that I might never be able to tell you that I was sorry!'"

"I was afraid," she sobbed, "that you could never get well. I was afraid that I might never be able to tell you that I was sorry!"

IT'S very easy to say an ungracious word, but it's very hard to unsay it. It's very easy to let an unkind thought slip out, but it's very hard to erase the

A DREAM

I DREAMED last night I stood upon a hill.

And saw below me, warmly calm and still,

A plain all dotted o'er with flocks of agaze,

And garden-spots wrapped in the golden haze

Of days to come.

I dreamed a dream last night,

And saw a world all touched with rosy light,

And little children playing in the sun,

With bits of steel that once had been a gun—

Building them into toys, with laughter gay.

I dreamed, and I awoke, and it was day—

A pallid day, and war screamed in the air,

And there was pain and sorrow everywhere;

And cannon-sounds came sighing o'er the sea,

And crept into the weary heart of me!

The New Year dawns, and war is on the land,

And Want and Fear stand waiting hand in hand;

Yet, past the strife, my searching eyes can see

The golden dream that came last night to me.

And I can see the fields of vivid grain;

And I can hear the children laugh again;

And I can see a world aglow with light;

For, lo, I dreamed a dream of Peace last night.

imprint of that thought from the heart of some one else. And life, at best, is uncertain.

"I never," a wife told me, "say an unpleasant thing to my husband when he is leaving for work in the morning. If he's done something inconsiderate that has annoyed me, I forget it. If there is any little worry to confide to him, I keep it for another time. Life, it seems to me, is very involved in the city, very uncertain. There are so many trucks and ears on the street, so many accidents every day, that I would hate to think that my husband, in the midst of all the hurry and worry, carried an unpleasant picture of me—a picture that I had created! I would hate to think, if anything did happen, that my face, when he saw it for the last time, had a frown on it. That's why I smile at him always when I say good-by in the morning, and let nothing but love shine out of my eyes!"

Life, at best, is uncertain. Death comes at unexpected times and points his finger at the unexpected person. It isn't always the man who has lived his fourscore years that is called; sometimes it is some one with youth all before him; with hope in his heart, and strength in his limbs, and courage in his soul.

AND this year, with nations writhing in the grip of a terrible war that has swept the whole world with its horror—life is even more uncertain than before. Courage and strength are being blotted out with the flash of a cannon. Hope and faith are being crushed under the bursting fragments of a bomb.

And so, because the whole world is weeping beside the grave that youth lies buried in (such an infinitely small part of the world we are!) we should be very thoughtful of the feelings of others. We should make a New Year's resolution never to say anything that we would wish unsaid under less happy circumstances—that we would be sorry about if the one we said it to were called away.

I heard some one singing a popular song a few days ago. It was a soldier-boy song, and it said something about "Send me away with a smile."

Let us, on this New Year, make a point of greeting folks cheerily, and sending them away just as cheerily, whether they are soldier-boys, or girl friends, or relatives, or acquaintances, or anything! Let's make a point of doing little kind deeds just for the sake of doing them, of going a little out of our way to be pleasant, of inconveniencing ourselves to make some one a bit happier!

For the New Year is, as it always is, a new chance; a new chance to do better things in a better way. The New Year is a brilliantly white new page to be covered with writing that may be clear or it may be very illegible. The New Year will be what you make it.

And every kind word you say, every good deed you do, every smile you smile, will help to make your writing clear. And if your writing on the page is clear, you will have nothing to be sorry for, no matter what the New Year may hold.

Young People's Topics for January 13

Young Christians Reaching Upward

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Ps. 63: 1-8

THE story of Excalibur, which never was omitted from any school reader in the generation which is past, is typical of the spirit of youth. Always they press onward—always they face forward—always they struggle upward. The fire of youth is well exemplified in a mere outline of the striking figures of the Old Testament. Joseph, Samuel, Gideon, David in his days of earlier leadership, Solomon in the years of his real greatness, Daniel and Esther, were all young. And the men who first received the Great Commission on the Mountain of Ascension were young men in their prime; while the great apostle to the Gentiles, when he saw the light in the Damascus road, was but little more than a youth fired with youth's enthusiasm.

Among the leaders of men in the church and out are few whose lives did not find the direction of leadership in the years of youth. Young People's Societies are making leaders for the church. Every life which they start to reaching upward is one more pillar of the church set firm upon its foundation. Those who seek God early escape the dry and thirsty land—the desert of disappointments. They find loving-kindness better than life; their soul is satisfied "with marrow and fatness," their youth speeds by on wings of faithful service, and in their later years they tread the paths of peace.

League Study Courses

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 54: 2-3, Matt 28: 18-20

WHEN a business man wants to enter a new field, he makes a thorough study of it before he sends out his salesmen. The church today has the world as its field. The Great Commission of the Master was to disciple all nations. To some degree that Commission has already been filled in the spirit, though all too many dark corners still remain; but we cannot intelligently participate in the enterprise unless we know something of the nations which it includes and of the challenge to leadership, the problems and the glorious possibilities which our missionaries face.

There is one first-class method by which we may inform ourselves and make ourselves more efficient in our present Christian work and more intelligent in our missionary interest. That way is to organize a mission study class. Knowledge is power in spiritual things as well as in temporal. When mission study classes were first started it was difficult to get proper books. Leaders had to exercise a great deal of ingenuity to secure material to maintain the interest of the classes. Now there are many books which tell the stories of battles of the cross so well that members of classes find it hard to wait for the lessons to follow in their natural sequence, but read on and ahead. Classes for good work should not exceed twenty in membership, and the weekly sessions should not much exceed an hour. The vice-president who fails to organize at least one mission study class is a broken cog in the "Epworth Wheel."

Officers of the League and leaders chosen for this meeting can secure special helps by addressing Ralph E. Diefendorfer, Educational Secretary, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City, or the Central office of the Epworth League, 740 Rush Street, Chicago, Ill.

A Partial Solution

THIS is the retired farmer's war, just as it is every American's war. He is needed on the farm. He knows how to farm. That is the main thing. His shadow in the fields next year will mean much to his community and to his country. The nation is getting ready to call him back to his old place. He may be too old to carry a rifle or fight in a trench, but he can still help to preserve the nation he has helped to build.—Farm Progress.

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous ailment.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use.

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 6421 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book, that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.

M. Weaver (Chief of Artillery), Major-General W. C. Crozier (Chief of Ordnance), Major-General E. H. Crowder (Judge Advocate General and Provost Marshal). This Council will devote itself to problems of supply connected with the American forces in the field and will be the connecting link between these forces and the War Department.

BACK IN SERVICE. Major-General G. V. Goethals, builder of the Panama Canal, returned to active service on December 17, at the request of Secretary of War Baker, taking charge of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, succeeding Major-General Sharpe, appointed to the new War Council.

SUBMARINES COLLIDE. The submarine F-1, U. S. N., was sunk December 18 in American waters by the submarine F-3, U. S. N., which rammed her sister-ship while maneuvering on the surface in a fog. The commanding officer of the F-1 and four others of the crew were saved. Nineteen members of the crew went down with the ship.

GORGAS NOT SATISFIED WITH CAMPS. The Secretary of War made public on December 18 reports to the chief of staff in which Major-General W. C. Gorgas, Surgeon General of the Army, reported a shortage at some of the camps of winter uniforms and overcoats. He reported also that at three of the camps the troops were quartered in tents and were suffering severely from the cold, being still in their summer uniforms. He reported also that the men were being crowded unduly, and recommended that fifty square feet of floor space be furnished for each man at all camps; only twenty being now provided in some. He reported also that, with the exception of Camp Funston, none of the camps were as yet equipped with base hospitals, and recommended the rushing of this work, and the establishment of observation camps to which to send new men so that diseases they might be carrying should not have a chance to get started in the training camps. As a result of lack of hospital facilities, crowding, and insufficient clothing, Surgeon-General Gorgas declared there had been an unnecessary increase in cases of pneumonia, measles and meningitis. The Secretary of War announced on the following day that the recommendations of the Surgeon-General had been largely complied with before the report was made public, that transportation difficulties had been partly to blame for the failure to properly clothe the men at some of the camps, and that, with the exception of the observation camps, nearly all of the bad conditions had been corrected.

INVESTIGATE SHIP BOARD. Following announcement on December 17 that Rear Admiral Harris had resigned as General Manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, to be succeeded by Charles A. Piez, vice-president, who became also the General Manager, the Senate ordered an inquiry into all matters connected with the Shipping Board kaleidoscope. Charles F. Hurley announced that his office would give the Senate every aid in getting at the facts.

GOVERNOR'S HOUSE BOMBED. The entire rear end of the Executive Mansion of the state of California at Sacramento was blown out by a powerful explosive bomb on December 18. Governor William D. Stevens and his household escaped injury.

THE SUFFRAGE CONVENTION. The forty-ninth annual convention of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association closed in Washington on December 16. The women decided to concentrate all their efforts for the next few weeks in securing the passage in the house of the Federal amendment to the United States Constitution. Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt was reelected president. Dr. Anna Howard Shaw in an address at the last public meeting declared that the government should enfranchise its women in order that they might devote themselves wholeheartedly and single-mindedly to war work.

FOR THE RED CROSS. The American Red Cross started on Sunday, December 16, a nation-wide Christmas drive for 10,000,000 members. The drive was made through 3,000 local chapters and many individual solicitors, and as this was written was gaining momentum rapidly, and promising to run far beyond the goal set. President Wilson in a special message to the nation declared that "Red Cross membership is the Christmas spirit in terms of action."

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Federal Trade Commission on December 20 began an investigation into the relations between the Chicago packing plants and the Chicago Stock Yards Company, the Union Stock Yards Company and the Chicago Junction Railway. It was charged that illegal rebates forbidden by the courts had been continued through the control of these properties. The inquiry was still proceeding at this writing. . . . A collision of passenger trains on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad at Shepherdsville, Ky., on December 20 killed sixty-seven persons and injured more than forty. . . . Secretary Lansing on December 20 made public further portions of the intercepted correspondence between Count von Luxburg in Argentina and the German Foreign Office. There was much material confirming former revelations, the only really new elements being several notes which showed Luxburg as confident of the friendship of President Irigoyen and as working for a secret anti-United States alliance between Argentina, Chile and Bolivia. . . . Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board on December 21 told the investigating committee of the Senate that there were on that date 996 ships contracted for, representing 1,344,900 tons of wooden ships, 207,000 tons of composite ships, and 3,965,200 tons of steel ships, a total of 5,517,100 tons. He stated that the building program of the navy had taken up seventy per cent. of the capacity of American shipyards existing at the time of the declaration of war, and that forty-two shipyards were being extended and developed. . . . Quartermaster General Henry G. Sharpe testifying before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate on December 21, declared that the failure to properly clothe the men at some of the camps was due in part to the time consumed by the civilian Board of National Defense, through which contracts for uniforms were placed, the Board saving money at the expense of prompt delivery; in part to the average size of the men of the National Army being greater than the average in the Federal or National Guard Armies, resulting in a shortage of the larger sizes; and in part to errors in making shipments to supply depots. He said that all equipment would be complete by December 31.

For Armenia and Jerusalem

SUNDAY schools which have not yet taken the Christmas offering for Armenian and Syrian Relief will still be able to contribute to this great cause before Christmas will be celebrated in Bible lands. In Jerusalem and Syria Christmas is celebrated according to the Gregorian Calendar, falling upon January 19 of our calendar. Collections taken up, therefore, as late as January 13 can be cabled to Jerusalem or Syria in time for their Christmas. It is stated that at the present time in Jerusalem wheat is $20 a bushel, flour $80 a barrel, potatoes $60 a bushel, bread 40 cents a pound, milk 40 cents a quart, sugar $25 a pound, and eggs 12 cents apiece.

The War in Europe

AUSTRIAN troops again attacked heavily, on December 18, 19 and 20, Italian positions between the Piave and Brenta rivers. On the 19th Austro-German forces occupied Italian positions on Monte Asolone, the Italian line being withdrawn slightly. This mountain was one of the barriers to the San Lorenzo Valley. The Teuton armies claimed the capture of over 3,000 prisoners in the three days' fighting. Attempts of Austrian forces to cross the Sile near the mouth of the Piave were frustrated by the Italian forces. On December 21 Italian counter-attacks won back a large part of the Monte Asolone position.

It was officially announced in Washington on December 19 that the Turks before surrendering Jerusalem to the British, had brutally treated the Christian priests, and had carried off the famous treasure of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, part of which had been sent to Berlin.

A German air raid on London by 16 or 20 raiding airplanes on December 19 killed ten persons and injured seventy in the city and injured five outside. One German plane was brought down and its crew captured.

U-boat total for the week ending December 19 was fourteen British merchantmen of more than 1,600 tons, three under that tonnage, one fishing vessel, and one French vessel of less than 1,600 tons.

German destroyers on December 17 overwhelmed a British convoy in the North Sea sinking the British destroyer Partridge, and putting the destroyer Pelew out of action, sinking also one British and five neutral merchantmen and four trawlers. The German destroyers succeeded in making their escape and public opinion in Great Britain was considerably wrought up over success of this raid, which was in many respects similar to one which had occurred several months before.

The negotiations between the Bolsheviks under Trotzky and the Germans, Austrians and Bulgarians resulted in an agreement on December 16 for an armistice to run until January 14, and provided that it begin immediately and that Germany should remove no troops from the Russian front except in case of troop movements already begun which could be completed. It was pointed out by experts that this latter provision practically nullified the other, since, as the movements have been made by the taking of individuals from different units without moving the unit as a whole there is nothing to prevent their continuing to take men from their units. On December 17, Trotzky notified the various Allied embassies that unless they would pass his couriers he would refuse similar courtesy to theirs. Reports from South Western Russia at this writing seemed to indicate that the Bolshevik régime was losing ground and that the Ukrainians and Cossacks were beginning to get the upper hand. There was a rumor that Kerensky, at the head of a large body of troops, was approaching Petrograd, but this was not confirmed. Petrograd reported fighting in the streets, in December 22, between Bolshevik troops and four army corps which had refused to longer obey orders of the Lenine-Trotzky government.

General Sarraill has been relieved of the command of the Allied armies in Macedonia, being succeeded by General Guillemet.

OUR MAIL-BAG

THE NEW SERVICE For Readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD

Special Free Information Bureau Opened in Washington, D. C.

The Christian Herald to Act as Clearing-House of Information Between the Government and the People

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that it can render no more important and practical service to its readers than to acquaint them with the results of the great work the American Government is doing for them in peace and in war.

Our government is the greatest organization devoted to a single purpose that the world has ever known. The keenest minds, the broadest learning, the most expert technical skill are turned, day in and day out, on every problem that confronts the American people. This statement is true of the problems of daily life as well as of the problems of war. Problems of the household, problems of the factory, problems of the city, questions of health and hygiene, questions of opportunity, of self-help and help for others—all these and many more are studied in Federal laboratories and in the field, by men at the head of their professions, with the resources of the richest nation on earth behind them.

The work is being done for you. Your government is doing it. You are entitled to the benefit of its results.

Merely to know the details of government activities, to see and understand the great machinery behind them, is to take a new pride in the United States and in American citizenship. But the government has more than pride to offer. It does its work to give concrete and practical help to its citizens in their homes and in their business. In crucial times like these, it has facts of vital moment to lay before the people.

The Christian Herald proposes to act as a clearing-house between the government and its readers. It purposes to assemble, compile and distribute the practical results of the great Federal work of research and investigation. It purposes to make this information available to every one of its readers. For this purpose the Christian Herald opens its new Washington Bureau.

The services of Mr. Frederic J. Haskin have been secured to conduct the new bureau. Mr. Haskin is well known as one of the leading authorities on the workings of the Federal government. His book, "The American Government," is a standard on the subject. The famous moving picture, "Uncle Sam at Work," is based on this book. Mr. Haskin is a man of wide travel and long experience in the accurate gathering and concise reporting of facts. His position in Washington fits him peculiarly for the work the bureau is to do.

The Christian Herald Information Bureau will answer questions and give information to its readers on almost any subject. There will be no charge of any kind for this service. The inquirer has only to enclose a stamp to cover postage on the reply. In addition to such service, the Information Bureau will from time to time offer without charge copies of official publications of general interest and practical usefulness along various lines.

While such free offerings will be mainly in pamphlet form, now, at the opening of the New Year, the Christian Herald has decided to begin its new service by offering each of its readers a free Art Calendar. Throughout the coming year this calendar may serve as a reminder of the establishment of the Christian Herald Information Bureau, and its readiness to serve Herald readers.

The free Art Calendar, in size 6 x 10 inches, is published by the United States Navy Department. It bears a reproduction of a striking and beautiful painting depicting the Spirit of Liberty, who points the way to an American seaman bearing the Stars and Stripes. This calendar should be in every American home, where a mother's heart follows a lad of our Navy "over there."

Like all the services of the new Information Bureau, this Calendar may be secured by any reader of the Christian Herald on sending a stamp to cover return postage. A 2-cent stamp is sufficient to cover postage on the Calendar. If inquiries are sent to the Information Bureau which must be answered in sealed envelopes, a 3-cent stamp for return postage is necessary.

Send for a copy of the Navy Calendar today. Simply fill in your name and address on the attached coupon, and mail with a 2-cent stamp to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C.

Ask the Christian Herald

"Whatever You Want to Know"

THE Christian Herald has established in Washington for the permanent use of its readers a free Information Bureau which will be glad to give you reliable information in answer to almost any question you choose to ask.

A large proportion of the daily inquiries will be answered by experts in the departments of the Federal government. This does not mean, however, that only questions related in some way to the work of the government will be answered. The Bureau is willing and able to answer questions on almost any subject. (Questions regarding the church or religious matters in general should be sent to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.)

The Bureau of Information was established in Washington rather than elsewhere, because of the tremendous resources of information and service which have been accumulated there by the Federal government—resources of which the average citizen has no adequate conception, and which he does not know how to reach.

The so-called Executive Departments of our National Government make up the most efficient and far-reaching machinery of service that the world has ever seen. There is in Washington an authority of the first rank on practically every question touching the well-being of humanity. There are magnificently equipped laboratories for the study of every problem of the nation's daily life.

The Libraries of the National Capital in themselves are a vast storehouse of useful information. The Library of Congress is recognized all over the world, both for its immense number of volumes and for the perfection of the system which makes them accessible. Many of the Bureau and Departmental Libraries are the finest in existence in their separate fields.

Thus this Bureau of Information is in a position to draw on the world's greatest resources of knowledge. The hearty cooperation of the experts in answering your queries is assured. It is the duty and the pleasure of these men to serve the public with the rare knowledge they command.

Copies of all answers sent out by this Bureau will be sent to the editorial office of the Christian Herald. Those that appear of general interest will be published in the Mail-Bag page.

It is impossible to make a complete enumeration of subjects giving an adequate idea of the scope and range in which the Bureau can serve you. Its activities can only be summed up in the phrase it has adopted for a motto:

"Whatever You Want to Know"

The resources of our free Information Bureau are at your service. You are invited to call upon it as often and as freely as you please. It has been established solely to serve you, as a final step in the friendly help of this magazine in bringing its readers into closer touch with their government.

There is no cost at all to you, except a three-cent stamp for each inquiry for return postage.

State your question or the information you desire plainly, and address

The Christian Herald Information Bureau,
Frederic J. Haskin, Director,
Washington, D. C.

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the questions, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters nor to those written with lead pencil.

Questions and Answers

ANXIOUS, Alexandria, Va. That a mother, with the cares and responsibilities of a household and a young family, should feel the need of frequent prayer, is the most natural thing in the world. Even amid a host of duties she will somehow contrive to "take time to be holy," and to get private prayer when she can be alone with God and get strength and help for all her tasks and her troubles. She will do this, however, without neglecting the duties of the household, for work well and faithfully performed is in itself a prayer. In giving to her children the example of a Christian mother, who so regulates her life-work that no task which love or duty can suggest is neglected, she gives them the greatest incentive to the formation of noble character. There is no missionary Christian worker or evangelist who has a higher call to service, a greater trust or a grander privilege than a Christian mother, who performs faithfully and well the duties that lie within her sphere. She is one of those who lay the foundations of a nation's character and greatness.

Mrs. F. Diller, Neb., who has evidently just satisfied an ardent longing to get back to the farm, sends a letter which may serve as an encouragement to others with similar desires. She writes: "We longed to get back to the farm, so finally a brother (who might have more worldly goods and not hurt him) put his 'heart in his mouth' and his name to a slip of paper, so that we might buy farm machinery and horses and cows and pigs; for how can one farm without these very necessary articles? The ones dissatisfied with town life are not the ones who have fairly good jobs and are buying homes and saving a little. Those who do the manual labor and are not able to save on the wages they get are the ones who would go back to the farm if they could. Many of them came from the country originally, and so they know what they are wanting. I know several families that would move to a farm—but they can't. My heart has ached for those who are not able to exchange their ways and their work for the freedom and hard work of the farm."

Some time ago we printed a letter from a reader who sent as a gift for a benevolence an old, worn gold coin which had been treasured for many years in memory of some dear one long dead. Several letters have now reached us, showing how a tender chord evokes sympathy in other hearts. A lady in Erie, Pa., writes: "Several years ago my son gave me a gold five-dollar piece for a Christmas present, and I have kept it for some specially good purpose, and now I know what to do with it. I have been a reader of the Herald for many years (am over eighty years of age), and take much interest in the great work you have done and are doing for the poor and needy ones the world over. Please put the five dollars, which I enclose herewith, in the Bowery Mission fund, and may it help to bring some one to lead a true Christian life."

M. S., Alva, Okla., sends this kindly letter: "Enclosed are some little gold coins which I have kept for a good many years as keepsakes, for they belonged to my dear companion, who, some twenty years ago, passed away. I am sending them to you to be used for the relief of the suffering children in Europe. My regret is that I cannot do more, for my heart is very sad these days for all of the suffering. Your Christian Herald is a comfort to me and to others, to whom I pass it on, and who are too poor to subscribe for it."

A third, from M. L. B., New Haven, Conn., is extremely touching. It says: "I am sending you a gold dollar, which was given to me by an old lady, Miss M. B., of San Diego, Calif., who died last year. She was very poor, but had treasured it for about forty years, and sent it to me just before her death. I am sending it to you to be used for the relief of the widows and orphans, as I know she would be glad to have me use it in that way."

These gifts are of a character that stamps them as sacred. May all three bring blessing where they are used.

G. D. D., Hampton, N. H., a veteran subscriber, over eighty years of age, writes that he attributes his longevity to the fact that "forty-five years ago I cut out tobacco, tea, coffee, booze, bitters, fancy foods, and, later, all meat, pork and fried food. . . . Do not athletes and Arctic explorers cut out booze? Why should professional church leaders defend its army use?" Eighty is a ripe old age and temperance in all things has doubtless contributed to our friend's long life and health but we have nowhere heard of church leaders defending booze in the army. On the contrary, the tendency is everywhere in the opposite direction.

Why Live An Inferior Life?

CREATOR OF CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION

Swoboda

What Others Have to Say

"Worth more than a thousand dollars to me in increased mental and physical capacity."

"I was very skeptical, now am pleased with results; have gained 17 pounds."

"The very first lesson began to work magic. In my gratitude, I am telling my croaking and complaining friends, 'Try Swoboda.'"

"Words cannot explain the new life it imparts to both body and brain."

"It reduced my weight 29 pounds, increased my chest expansion 5 inches, reduced my waist 6 inches."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily."

"I think your system is wonderful. I thought I was in the best of physical health before I wrote for your course, but I can now note the greatest improvement even in this short time. I cannot recommend your system too highly. Do not hesitate to refer to me."

"You know more about the human body than any man with whom I have ever come in contact personally or otherwise."

I know that I can easily, quickly and positively prove to you that you are only half as alive as you must be to realize the joys and benefits of living in full; and that you are only half as well as you should be, half as vigorous as you can be, half as ambitious as you may be, and only half as well developed as you ought to be.

THE fact is that no matter who you are, whether you are young or old, weak or strong, rich or poor, I can prove to you readily by demonstration that you are leading an inferior life, and I want the opportunity to show you the way in which you may completely and easily, without inconvenience or loss of time, come into possession of new life, vigor, energy, development and a higher realization of life and success.

Become Superior to Other Men

The Swoboda System can make a better human being of you physically, mentally and in every way. The Swoboda System can do more for you than you can imagine. It can so vitalize every organ, tissue and cell of your body as to make the mere act of living a joy. It can give you an intense, thrilling and pulsating nature. It can increase your very life. I not only promise it, I guarantee it. My guarantee is unusual, startling, specific, positive and absolutely fraud-proof.

WHY TAKE LESS THAN YOUR FULL SHARE OF LIFE AND PLEASURE?

Are you living a full and successful life? Why not always be at your best—thoroughly well, virile, energetic? Why not invest in yourself and make the most of your every opportunity? It is easy when you know how. The Swoboda System points the way. It requires no drugs, no appliances, no dieting, no study, no loss of time, no special bathing; there is nothing to worry you. It gives ideal mental and physical conditions without inconvenience or trouble.

Your Earning Power,

your success, depend entirely upon your energy, health, vitality, memory and will power. Without these, all knowledge becomes of small value, for it cannot be put into active use. The Swoboda System can make you tireless, improve your memory, intensify your will power, and make you physically just as you ought to be.

This New Copyrighted Book is Free

Swoboda has written a wonderful explanation of the human body and its evolution. This book explains Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. It explains the Swoboda theory and laws of mind and body. It startles, educates, and enlightens. It explains as never before the reason for the evolution of the mind and body. It tells how the cells and their energies build the organs and the body, and it tells how to organize the cells beyond the point where nature left off for you. It will give you a better understanding of yourself than you could obtain through reading all of the books of science and philosophy on the subject of the body and mind, because it explains principles that have never before been explained by scientists or philosophers. It is impossible to duplicate elsewhere the information it gives, and the value of the information is beyond estimate.

Swoboda has written a simple, but a really scientific and philosophical explanation of the actual evolutionary cause of old age. This essay has been pronounced a classic which will stand as a basic and real analysis of evolution and of the ageing of the cells of the human body. It explains the psychological and evolutionary errors and elements involved in the production of ageing. Without being compelled to study text books on psychology, philosophy, biology, histology, etc., you will through reading this brief analysis learn fully what is nature, when is nature not nature, what is the cause of growth, maturity, evolution and decay. Swoboda has the happy faculty of being able to put a whole science into a comparatively few words. This essay will interest not only men and women who are merely interested in avoiding the nightmare of old age, and those who realize consciously that they are growing older in body, but it will also interest the scientist, the philosopher, the psychologist, as well as the pure speculator on the subject of life. Every man and woman will read this work and profit by it. It is the A, B, C of perpetual youth. It will mean astonishment to the scientist. It brings confusion to those who practice self-deception. It brings embarrassment to those who believe old age necessary. It seems bold, but this is only the effect of mis-conceptions concerning the necessity of old age.

THE FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH—the pursuit of perpetual youth—has always been very alluring, but here we have a guide to its source. No intelligent human being will need coaxing to drink of this fountain, for its spirit gives life, and arrests decay and destroys the nightmare of old age. Perpetual youth will mean to the human race more than is the power of any human being to estimate. Imagine what it will mean to double, triple, or even quadruple the length of human life and multiply human energy.

You owe yourself a reading of this essay on the Swoboda philosophy and science. It will put you favorably in touch and in harmony with your creative forces. You will harness them, capitalize them, and employ them. The result will amaze you. This essay which Swoboda has written and copyrighted will be sent to you free of charge and free of all obligations to Swoboda, if you will write for it. Just write your name and address on this page, tear it out and mail it to Swoboda, or draw a ring around your name on your letter-head, or merely send a postal, giving your name and address. Do it today. Read it, and learn how to be perpetually young, for you cannot afford to live an inferior life and to grow old. Address

Jerusalem in winter, an unusual photograph of the Holy City after one of the very infrequent snowstorms

THE Jews have never yet renounced their claim on Jerusalem and the land of Judea. In all their long history of wanderings and sojournings they have looked with a longing eye toward Palestine, the land of their fathers.

Cynics sneer at the assumption of the Jew in his claim to the land of Palestine, but let those cynics remember that the Jew has never lost sight of or forgotten that Palestine is his birthright. It was taken from him by force, and he was carried away from it as a slave and a hireling into a strange land, and through all the long ages and multiplied generations the devout Jew has never failed to turn his face toward Jerusalem and pray for the return of his people to his people's own land. It is asserted today on good authority that the conforming Jews pray three times a day that their "eyes may see the return to Zion."

Says Joseph Cowen: "At our Annual Feast of Freedom (the Passover) we pray in our most exalted moment, 'May our next year find us in Jerusalem'; and year by year, three weeks of humiliation, beginning and ending with strict fast days, demonstrate the fact that although a Jew's right hand, as a nation, may have forgotten its cunning, it can never forget Jerusalem." He continues: "I know it will be said, and it is true, that to many Jews these are mere words—lip service—conventional or traditional ceremonies. Others, it may be rightly said, do not say the prayers, observe the ceremonies, or even wish the spirit that animates to find its fulfillment."

Yet to the great mass of Jews the world over the hope of Israel's restoration is a real and true one. It is, indeed, the one great fact that has made for the persistence of the Jews to this day. In times of trouble and persecution—and when has the Jew been free from these?—the idea of the restoration, together with his belief in his religion, have been the Jew's one and only ray of light. "Man does not live by bread alone," and the Jew has lived and will continue to live for the Jew's ideal, his restoration to his land—Erets Yisrael—the land of Israel.

The Jewish National Organization is the first Zionist movement of a practical nature which the Jews have put forth. It is indeed a national and a Jewish propaganda for practical colonization in Palestine by the Jews.

THE idea that it is a setback of Jewish history is a controversial fiction. The great bulk of the Jewish people have throughout their history remained faithful to the dream of a restorative life in Judea. Its manifestations have suffered temporary modifications under the influence of changing political conditions, and the intensity with which it has been held by individual Jews has varied according to their social circumstances, but in the main the ideal has been passionately clung to.

Strange as it may seem, the reincarnation of Judaism took place in Germany. Another strange anomaly is that Germany has been the cradle of Anti-Judaism and Anti-Semitism. In America, especially since this present great world war has blasted and demoralized a large portion of the earth, the Reform Jews have recanted concerning their opposition to Jewish nationalism, and thereby have grown stronger as a religious force.

The Jew today who wants to retain his Judaism, who is in sympathy with Jewish ideals and idioms and thoughts and shares in the noblest manner with the whole world's development and advancement, has become an enthusiastic supporter of the crowning purpose and idea of the quick restoration of Jewish nationality in the land of Judea. This purpose and idea of the Jew returning to the former home of the tribe of Judah is powerfully illustrated in the following historic fact:

In 1905 the British government offered to the Zionist Congress—the organized representative of the Jewish people—a large tract of land in East Africa for Jewish settlement. The Zionist Congress thanked the British government very politely, but stated in their refusal of the offer "that only in Palestine, the fatherland of the Jews, could the Jewish people undertake a national settlement with any degree of hope of success." So as late as 1905 the Jew preferred to be homeless rather than be diverted from the centuries' striving for a home in the long-ages-ago homeland.

Various attempts at colonizing the Jews have been attempted in the last twenty or twenty-five years. One of the most notable was the Hirsch attempt at establishing a Jewish colony in South America, but it was not popular with the Jews, for nearly all the American and European Jews favored the Zionist movement, which had the fatherland of Judea as its prime object and purpose.

THE Zionist movement is the direct result of the labor of Theodor Herzl, who wrote "The Jewish State" in 1895 and published it in 1896. His work aroused great enthusiasm among the Jews, but there was considerable opposition to it among American Jews at the time. The Dreyfus affair in France created much agitation for and against the Zionist movement. Theodor Herzl was then living in Paris and was a correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse, and as such he became more conversant with the great Jewish question of Zionism. Herzl was an ardent and indefatigable worker, and became the leader of Jewish Nationalism and remained such until the day of his death.

Theodor Herzl died in 1904, and Max Nordau, who had strongly, loyally and ardently supported Herzl up to the day of his death, became the head of the Zionist movement.

The first agricultural Jewish colony in the land of Judea was planned or founded in 1878. Up to that time the main effort of the Jews had been toward the founding of homes in Palestine for aged and infirm Jews, fostered by philanthropists after the type of Sir Moses Montefiore. At the time of the founding of the first Jewish colony the entire Jewish population

President Wilson Takes Over the Railroads

FOR several weeks the pressure of national interest; the impossibility of solving great railway problems, national in their extent, on the basis of individual ownership of equipment and facilities; the piling up of freight at junction points and terminals; the conflict of priority orders by various departments which resulted in no priority for anybody and increased congestion for all, made it evident that the whole railway situation would have to be recast on a national basis, either by the voluntary placing of the railroads under a common executive or by the exercise of the powers granted to the President to take over the railroads and operate them as a unit for government account. This problem was complicated by the problems of maintaining the value of railroad securities and of wage requirements of railway employees.

If the government took the railroads without a guarantee of satisfactory return on investments such action would inevitably result in great loss of value to railroad securities, exceeding $20,000,000,000 in value, in the hands of the people. This would seriously embarrass the financial undertakings of the government. If satisfactory agreements could not be made with the bodies of railway workmen no great success could be achieved in the operation of the railroads either by the nation or otherwise. In conferences held by the President these two problems were thrashed out so that the Chief Executive was able to go ahead with the program, the President being assured by the heads of the railway brotherhoods that they would loyally support the government in any action which it was found necessary to take, and the President assuring the railway executives that he would use his influence with Congress to secure just compensation. Having reached this point, the President on December 26 issued a proclamation under authority of the Act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, in which he provided for the taking over by the nation of all the railway systems in the country with their owned and controlled systems of water transportation, the order to affect all railroads excepting electric street railway and interurban roads, which, as provided, may be taken over later. In his proclamation the President first recited the facts of the war and the provisions of the law and declaring the necessity of the railroads to national defense, continued, in part, as follows:

Now, THEREFORE, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, under and by virtue of the powers vested in me by the foregoing resolutions and statute, and by virtue of all other powers thereto enabling, do hereby, through Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, take possession and assume control at 12 o'clock noon on the twenty-eighth day of December, 1917, of each and every system of transportation and the appurtenances thereof located wholly or in part within the boundaries of the continental United States and consisting of railroads, and owned or controlled systems of coastwise and inland transportation, engaged in general transportation, whether operated by steam or by electric power, including also terminals, terminal companies and terminal associations, sleeping and parlor cars, private cars and private car lines, elevators, warehouses, telegraph and telephone lines, and all other equipment and appurtenances commonly used upon or operated as a part of such rail or combined rail and water systems of transportation—to the end that such systems of transportation be utilized for the transfer and transportation of troops, war material and equipment to the exclusion so far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon. . . .

It is hereby directed that the possession, control, operation, and utilization of such transportation systems hereby by me undertaken shall be exercised by and through William G. McAdoo, who is hereby appointed and designated Director General of Railroads. Said Director may perform the duties imposed upon him so long, and to such extent, as he shall determine, through the boards of Directors, receivers, officers, and employees of said systems of transportation. . . .

Until and except so far as said Director shall from time to time otherwise by general or special orders determine, such systems of transportation shall remain subject to all existing statutes and orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to all statutes and orders of regulating commissions of the various States in which said systems or any part thereof may be situated. But any orders, general or special, hereafter made by said Director shall have paramount authority and be obeyed as such. . . .

The Director shall, as soon as may be after having assumed such possession and control, enter upon negotiations with the several companies looking to agreements for just and reasonable compensation for the possession, use, and control of the respective properties on the basis of an annual guaranteed compensation above accruing depreciation and the maintenance of their properties, equivalent, as nearly as may be, to the average of the net operating income thereof for the three-year period ending June 30, 1917, the results of such negotiations to be reported to me for such action as may be appropriate and lawful. . . .

But nothing herein contained, expressed or implied, or hereafter done or suffered hereunder shall be deemed in any way to impair the rights of the stockholders, bondholders, creditors, and other persons having interests in said systems of transportation or in the profits thereof, to receive just and adequate compensation for the use and control and operation of their property hereby assumed. . . .

From and after 12 o'clock on said twenty-eighth day of December, 1917, all transportation systems included in this order and proclamation shall conclusively be deemed within the possession of said Director, without further act or notice. But for the purposes of accounting said possession and control shall date from 12 o'clock midnight on December 31, 1917.

In addition to the proclamation the President made public a statement explaining his action, which was in part as follows:

I have exercised the powers over the transportation systems of the country which were granted me by the act of Congress of August, 1917, because it has become imperatively in Palestine was thirty-four thousand, out of a half-million comprising the whole population of Palestine. Up to 1903 the Jewish population had grown to seventy thousand, with five thousand Jewish colonists, out of a population of six hundred and eighty thousand. In 1911, the last date obtainable, there were one hundred thousand Jews, out of a population of seven hundred thousand, ten thousand of whom were Jewish colonists. From 1898 to 1911 the Jewish colonies had increased in number from twenty-five to forty-one. These Jewish colonies are scattered over Palestine about as follows: "Judea fifteen, Samaria eight, Galilee sixteen, and one in Transjordan. The entire colonies comprise about one hundred thousand acres. Schools have been opened, and at the last Zionist Congress, which was held at Vienna, Austria, in 1913, a committee was appointed to look into the establishing of a Jewish university; and there is little doubt that but for the breaking out of the great war it would have been an established fact. In Haifa there is already a high school half built.

Hebrew is being resuscitated in Palestine as a living language. Formerly it was confined to a form of prayer in the synagogue, but the Zionists now, especially in Palestine, are using it as an everyday language, and it is recognized as one of the languages of the Holy Land.

THE Anglo-Palestine Company has very largely assisted in the industrial, commercial and financial claims and purposes of the Jews in Palestine and for the furtherance of Zionist movements in the land. This company has offices today in Tiberias, Beirut, Haifa, Hebron, Safed and Jerusalem. The Jewish organization, or Zionists, as they are now generally called, have founded a national fund with the avowed purpose of acquiring land in Palestine to be the inalienable property of the Jews, which property is to be leased only to Jews. Today the Zionist organization has a capital of about one and one-quarter million of dollars. Also connected with the Zionist and under its direction there are the following institutions: The Palestine Land Development and Jewish Agricultural Experiment Station at Haifa; Cooperative Settlements; The Olive Tree Fund and Jewish Culture Fund Societies; besides the Jewish National Library at Jerusalem. The subsidiary organizations are for the general development of Jewish settlements in Palestine.

There are in almost every civilized country in the world Zionist organizations supporting the movements of the Zionist Congress and the Zionist main organization. A world-wide appeal has been made to every Jew on the face of the earth, and the great mass of the Jews everywhere have responded and are responding. There are also special societies in various parts of the world for the promotion of special study of the Hebrew language and Hebrew culture, physical and spiritual. Organizations are springing up everywhere whose chief efforts are for the regeneration of the Jewish people as a nation. At Tel-Aviv in the vicinity of Jaffa there is today a peculiarly modern Jewish garden city, erected, governed and inhabited by Jews only. It is a city with wide streets, well lighted and drained, and policed by Jews. A council governs it, elected by Jews only. In fact, Tel-Aviv is a Zionist commonwealth in miniature, a good prototype of what the coming Jewish commonwealth of Palestine will be.

THAT the Jews are claiming Palestine is very evident today in numerous instances through and even outside the Zionist movement. A remarkable instance of individual development and colonization of Palestine is that of Baron Edmund de Rothschild, who has invested or expended a large sum of money for the clearing up of the way for a general influx of Jews into Jewry and Palestine. Wealthy Jewish women have shown remarkable vigor and energy in what we might call Red Cross work in these days when Red Cross agitation is all ablaze. They have instituted almshouses and hospitals and even agricultural companies.

Many people want to know how the Jews are going to transplant or transport the six-to-one population of Palestine as Gentile and Jew. It will hardly be as the exodus of the Jews out of Egypt into Palestine, so many centuries ago. The great bulk of the population of Palestine today is nomadic, and it will not be such a towering obstacle to overcome when the Jew gets ready with his presence and his money to capture Palestine. Nomads, Arabs and Turks and other peoples who are cosmopolitan in habits and character—and no real settled colonizing people—have inhabited Judea and all Palestine, on and off, for centuries; while the Jew, desiring a homeland and being capable of developing a homeland, has been a wanderer and an alien in every land under the sun.

Time is a great leveler. The time has come, through the fortunes of war, Judah is coming back to his own former inheritance. The Jews will soon occupy their own, and the land of Judea and all of Palestine will again blossom as the rose and bloom as the lily of the valley. For hundreds of years there has been under the Turkish rule little development in Palestine of the dormant powers and capabilities of the land. The Jews alone in the last twenty-five years have done more to develop Palestine than the Turk has done in five hundred years.

Twelve hundred delegates met in Baltimore the last week of June, 1917, for the avowed purpose and object of making the dream of Theodor Herzl a living reality. Since the great world war was commenced the Zionist movement has advanced more in a little less than three years than it did in the thirty years preceding. General Allenby at the head of a British army has already driven the Turk from Jerusalem and a large area of Palestine. The British government never allows one of its generals to give away a secret and retain his position, so it is self-evident that it is no secret with the British government when General Murray said: "The thing to be done with Palestine is to make it a 'new Jewish state' under the protection of the Entente Allies, which latter include all nations of the earth outside of the so-called Central Allies of Europe." This is fully supported by utterances of British statesmen.

The Baltimore Convention, with a general fund of one million dollars, purposes to organize an industrial and commercial army to be in readiness to leave for Palestine as soon as the war shall end. The Baltimore Convention also perfected plans for mutual cooperation with other of the Entente Allied nations in the settlement of the Jews in Jewry and the general Hebrew family in all of Palestine.

There may not be a very large exodus of Jews from America, but the Jews in Great Britain and Europe, especially the southeastern portion of Europe, are ripe for a general exodus to the land of their forefathers. There are about thirteen millions of Jews in the world. Over one half of these millions live now in eastern Europe. These millions are living at present in a very unsatisfactory condition. The end of the great war will bring about a culmination of Jewish upheaval and a mighty exodus to the land of Palestine. The war has already uprooted and broken up the homes of two millions of Jews in eastern Europe. These two millions are certain to start for the Holy Land as soon as the way is open and safe. These two millions alone will more than double the present population of the Holy Land. It is possible that the most of that homeless two millions will get into Palestine within one year after the war ends.

The Jews, by long ages of suffering and the passing away in slavery of untold generations, have earned the God-given right to a national existence, and neither England nor America will deny them that privilege when the time is ripe and the maturity of freedom has come.

The Central Powers Offer General Peace

THE Teutonic Powers are ready to make an immediate general peace without forcible annexations and without punitive indemnities. This is their answer through Count Czernin, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, made on Christmas Day at Brest-Litovsk to the Russian proposals, which they are ready to accept in most particulars as the basis of negotiations.

The Central (Teutonic) Powers insist, however, that they cannot bind themselves one-sidedly to such conditions. They share the view of the Russian delegation, which condemns the continuation of the war purely for aims of conquest.

"The statesmen of the allied (Teutonic) Governments, in programs and statements," declared Count Czernin, "have emphasized time and again that for the sake of conquest they will not prolong the war a single day."

Upon the basis of the Russian peace proposal, the Central Powers submit these propositions:

"Forcible annexations of territories seized during the war does not enter into the intentions of the allied (Teutonic) powers. It is not the intention of the (Teutonic) allies to deprive of political independence those nations which lost it during the war. The question of subjection to that or the other country of those nationalities who have not political independence cannot, in the opinion of the powers of the Quadruple Alliance, be solved internationally. In this case, it must be solved by each government together with its peoples in a manner established by the constitution.

"Likewise, in accordance with the declaration of statesmen of the Quadruple Alliance (Teutonic), the protection of the rights of minorities constitutes an essential component part of the constitutional rights of peoples to self-determination. The allied (Teutonic) governments also grant validity to this principle everywhere, in so far as it is practically realizable.

"Every belligerent power would have only to make indemnification for expenditures for its nationals who have become prisoners of war, as well as for damage done in its own territory by illegal acts of force committed against civilian nationals belonging to the enemy. The Russian government's proposal for the creation of a special fund for this purpose could be taken into consideration only if the other belligerent powers were to join in the peace negotiations within a suitable period.

"The return of colonial territories forcibly seized during the war constitutes an essential part of the German demands, which Germany cannot renounce under any circumstances. Likewise, the Russian demand for immediate evacuation of territories occupied by an adversary conforms to German intentions."

Chairman Jaffe, of the Russian delegation, following Count Czernin, stated that, notwithstanding differences of opinion, he thought that the authoritative declaration that Germany has no aggressive plans offered the possibility of the immediate beginning of negotiations for a general peace among all belligerents. He proposed a ten days' recess until January 4, "so that the peoples whose governments have not yet joined in the negotiations for a general peace may have an opportunity to acquaint themselves with the principles of such a peace as now is being established.

"At the expiration of the indicated time," Jaffe declared, "the negotiations must be resumed, disregarding whether or not other belligerents have joined in the negotiations, or how many."

The peace terms are not viewed with favor in England. The Daily Mail says regarding the proposal for the return of the German colonies: "The British empire will be blown sky-high before that happens." The Daily News remarks: "On the vital question of Belgium and the hardly less vital

Three of the first American prisoners of war taken by Germany. These pictures were published in the "Welt im Bild" and reached this country through British official sources question of Serbia, the German solution is altogether unacceptable. It accepts restoration, but it explicitly rules out restitution. It applies to the problems of Alsace, Lorraine and Poland a formula that, as it stands, means the refusal of any guarantee that the just claims of the inhabitants of either area will be recognized."

What may be regarded as a prompt British reply to the peace offer is the following statement of Premier Lloyd George in a letter to the Labor Congress, December 28:

"Achievement of the purposes for which the allies are fighting is essential to the future freedom and peace of mankind."

The premier said that a statement on war aims could only be made in agreement with Great Britain's allies. The question of issuing a fresh joint declaration, he added, was being constantly kept in view by the Entente allied governments.

The official attitude of France is indicated by Foreign Minister Pinchon, who declared in the Chamber of Deputies, December 27:

"After suffering as we have, we cannot accept peace based on the status quo. By agreement with our allies, we are

York harbor through lack of coal, and that the number was increasing daily, although strenuous efforts were being made to supply them. Some of the vessels had been detained more than a month. The first step in national control was taken on December 27, when the Fuel Administration issued orders forbidding the making of coal contracts for more than a year in advance, and providing for the canceling of any contract by the Fuel Administration.

NO MORE COLD SOLDIERS. Senate Military Affairs Committee on December 26 adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of War to take immediate steps cutting as much red tape as necessary, to supply shortages in clothing which this investigation had shown existed in some of the military camps. The total shortage was declared before the committee to be 20,000 overcoats and 47,000 woolen blouses. Of 7,000 coats shipped to one camp, 4,000 were useless because they were too small. Orders were immediately issued by the War Department to commanders of the camps authorizing them to supply their shortages from any stores available in the neighborhood of the camps. Further testimony showed that 45 per cent.

ber 22 appeared before the Senate committee investigating the sugar shortage. Mr. Hoover had a prepared statement covering all the accusations made against his administration by witnesses before the committee and giving a detailed report of all activities in connection with the sugar situation. Senator Reed, chairman of the committee, on the ground that Mr. Hoover was to be a witness on December 28, refused to permit him to make the statement, in spite of the fact that it was understood that the President desired this courtesy to be extended to Mr. Hoover. The following day the President himself made public the statement which showed that no sugar had been withheld in this country, and that the famine in the North-eastern States was almost entirely due to the shipments sent abroad to cover the absolutely necessary needs of our Allies. The statement showed also that there would probably be a shortage of sugar through 1918, and that Americans would need to exercise economy to the extent of 10 per cent. of their ordinary consumption in order to avoid shortage and provide for necessary exports. It was pointed out that whereas the Allies before the war took only 300,000 tons of sugar annually from the western hemisphere, they had taken this year 1,400,000 tons. It was also shown that the consumption in England had been reduced to twenty-four pounds a year per person and in France to fourteen pounds while American consumption was at the rate of fifty-five pounds a year per person. It was stated that there was some 150,000 tons of sugar in Java, but other requirements forbade the use of ships for this long voyage.

LOCKED ON THE STOCKS. Testimony by E. N. Hurley, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, before the Senate Commerce Committee, showed that the changes in personnel of the Shipping Board had resulted in more than two months' delay in the completion of ships. According to Mr. Hurley, the lack of harmony between General Goethals and former Chairman Demman had not resulted in a serious delay, but Admiral Capps, who succeeded General Goethals, had delayed for more than two months the awarding of contracts approved by his predecessor. The hold-up was due to the desire of the Admiral to go over the plans before passing them. Some modifications were made, especially in the manner of making payments. The wooden ship building program was similarly held up pending an investigation and the preparation of new specifications, by a special committee headed by Charles Piez, at present General Manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. It was shown also that wooden ship building on the Eastern Coast had been seriously delayed by the failure of the Southern Pines Association to keep their promise regarding the delivery of timber. Because of this, it was stated that it might be necessary to transfer the major portion of the wooden ship program to the Western Coast, although there was some evidence that it might be abandoned. Some delay was also caused through the changing of plans in order that certain vessels under construction might be equipped with oil-burning engines. On December 24 it was announced that the government's program of 8,246,308 tons was 18.2-10 per cent. complete, and that the 1918 output would be in the neighborhood of 5,000,000 tons.

AMERICAN SENTRY MURDERED. Press reports on December 25, passed by the censor but not supported by any official report, told of the finding, after a German raid on trenches held by American troops, of a lone sentry of an infantry regiment, with his throat cut from ear to ear. It was surmised that he had been overwhelmed by a superior force of Germans and had been killed after being captured. General Pershing's daily reports on the 24th and 25th of December included five names of soldiers killed in action. The nature of the action was

The Quest of Souls

THE Christian Herald Family for more than two years has had an abiding interest in the work of Mr. and Mrs. Norton, in London and behind the lines for the Belgian soldiers. Next week Mrs. Norton lets us look into the souls of three young Belgians who found the Christ through the Testaments and meetings which this work brought to them. Frank Carpenter has developed an awful appetite for food subjects. After whetting our sweet tooth this week he comes at us again next week with a story about fish.

It takes an awful jolt sometimes to carry Christians across denominational lines. A cyclone did it in Red Hill, Kansas, where Howard Chase is laboring under the expert guidance of Pastor Sheldon.

Human partnerships sometimes fail. Rev. William H. Bates in next week's sermon tells of one that never fails—partnership with Jesus.

ready to discuss direct propositions regarding peace, but this is indirect."

In Washington the disposition in official and diplomatic circles is to question the sincerity of Count Czernin's proposal for a peace basis. The American position has been clearly stated by President Wilson—namely, that the United States will not enter into negotiations with any Government which does not represent the free will of the governed people. There has been no change in this position.

COAL COMES NEXT. Federal Coal Administrator Garfield on December 26 told the Senate Coal Investigating Committee that the Fuel Administration had been forced to work in a circle in its efforts to get coal to those who needed it most. He declared that the country this year did not have the usual reserve of coal, and that the only solution lay in stimulating production and in adequate transportation. He declared that government control of coal mines would be inevitable if the war lasted much longer. It was stated on the same day that 100 steamships, aggregating more than a million tons' cargo capacity, were being held in New of the country's weaving establishments were making woolen cloth for the army, but that deliveries had been delayed by strikes and other causes, being 100,000 garments behind specifications, total deliveries being 46 per cent. of total orders, some of which would not be completed for several months. In New York on December 27 arrests were made of men accused of conspiring to steal uniform cloth from sponging and finishing plants. Cloth valued at $50,000 was recovered. More finds were expected.

OVER THE BORDER. Mexican bandits on December 25 crossed into American territory near Candelaria, Texas, killing the driver of a mail stage and two passengers, looting the mail sacks and raiding also a nearby ranch and store. American troops followed the raiders across the Rio Grande, engaging the bandits in a running fight in which one American soldier and eight bandits were killed. Additional cavalry were sent to continue the pursuit. These returned to American soil on December 27 reporting the killing of ten more bandits and the recovery of much of the loot. One American trooper was wounded.

A Homily for the New Year

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.*

TEXT—Psalm 101. "I will walk within my house with a perfect heart."

CAN I persuade you to read this short Psalm of only eight verses? And will you not please read it over and over again until you are quite familiar with its language, and then hold the page open before you and compare the text as you follow this exposition?

It was written by David, you see; the shepherd lad, the sweet singer of Israel, the brave warrior, the victorious king; a great sinner too, but humble and penitent; and through it all, and for that reason, a man after God's own heart (I Sam. 13 : 14).

It is a reminiscent Psalm. He is looking back over the past, just as we are today, and he is singing of mercy and judgment. Are we doing so? Does the twelvemonth just closed reveal mercy in the retrospect? It reveals judgment, you say. Yes, there was chastening and sorrow in it, no doubt; but judgment takes on another shape. There is justice in judgment, and righteousness, and fair-dealing. There is reward for the godly in divine judgments, and have you not known that? You assuredly have known it, if your dealings with the Source of all power and grace have been as close and intimate as those of David. No second causes for him; no intermediary interferes with his heavenly fellowship; he goes straight to the throne. "Unto thee, O Lord, will I sing!"

And it is because of this that he is moved so freely to utter the vow of the next verse, "I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way," or as the margin puts it, "I will give heed unto the perfect way." There is only one "perfect way," of course, and that is the way of God's testimonies, the way of obedience to his will for us. It is the way into which we come through faith in Jesus Christ and the confession of his name before men. He is "the way, the truth and the life" (John 14 : 6). Have you yet entered into that way? If so, then there is such a thing as behaving yourself "wisely" in it. There is such a thing as growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (II Peter 3 : 18); and it is to be hoped that this is what you purpose to do this year for the same reason that David purposed to do it.

But, after all, how was he going to do it? How could he carry it out? Would he not certainly fail? How often have you and I made resolutions that have come to naught and left us worse off than before? But David is not so foolish. His strength is made perfect in weakness (II Cor. 12 : 9). He will surrender himself to God in this matter, and let the power of the Most High sustain him in well-doing; for he exclaims, "Oh, when wilt thou come unto me?" That is it, David; put thy trust there and he will never fail thee. "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye," said Jesus, "except ye abide in me" (John 15 : 4). That is the secret of a holy life; and when God comes in to dwell with us like that, then we with assurance can say as David did, "I will walk within my house with a perfect heart."

BUT at this point how doubly interesting the Psalm becomes! For no sooner does David make this pledge than he begins to tell us what it means.

First he says, "I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes." Of course, wicked things would force their way before his eyes as they do in the case of all of us; but David would not "set" them there. He would not be responsible for their coming. If sinful suggestions and solicitations entered his mind he would dismiss them. They would not become his aim or purpose in life; his affections would not be permitted to entwine about them.

Second, "I hate the work of them that turn aside; it shall not cleave to me." "I hate the doing of unfaithfulness," is the way some translate it; while others render it, "I hate the committing of transgression." At all events David hated it; that is the point. This thing might alight upon him "as a foul bird might alight upon his dwelling, but he would see to it that it did not nestle or breed there." "It shall not cleave to me," he says.

Third, "a froward heart shall depart from me; I will not know a wicked person." "Froward" is short for "froward," and the expression means one who is turned from or who is holding out against what is right; one who is perverse, wayward, ungovernable. David would not know such a person; he would not let him become his friend or intimate companion. He specifies these froward persons. "Whoso privily slandereth his neighbor" is one of them, and if such an one is on his calling list, "him will I cut off," he says. The man with "an high look and a proud heart" is another. "He that worketh deceit" is still another, and "he that telleth lies."

"OH," you say, "David is not talking about himself so much as he is talking about other people." No, you are mistaken; he is talking about himself. The man who will have nothing to do with crooked characters must himself first be straight. It means something to separate yourself from froward people, to turn your back on the contentious, and the evil speakers, and the proud and hypocritical, and the dishonorable and untruthful. For a while it costs to do this. It costs in dollars and cents; it costs in one's position and influence; it costs in many of the pleasures and luxuries of life; it costs in physical comfort; it costs above all in the test and strain it puts upon one's moral character and his spiritual faith. Try it and see. See not merely what it means to you, but what it means in you. In other words, only a regenerated man is capable of such a purpose as that of David, much less the execution of it. Only such a man as was referred to before, one who has truly received Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord; as Pharaoh said of Joseph, "a man in whom the Spirit of God is."

Every one who carefully reads this Psalm feels that it must have been written at some critical period in David's life. At the time when he was divinely taken from the sheepcote to be set among princes? At the time when Samuel anointed him to be king? At the time when, on the death of Saul, he succeeded to the throne of Judah, or later, when the whole kingdom of the twelve tribes came under his hand? Was it when he brought up the ark of the covenant to find its resting-place, as the symbol of Jehovah, in Jerusalem? Who knows?

WHAT a great thing it would be if the mayor of a metropolitan city, just going into office, would read this Psalm! And perhaps he will. But what a greater thing if he acted upon it! How that performance would illuminate his character and show the manner of man he is! What a purification of municipal politics would ensue! Would he be reelected if he made this Psalm his platform? He would not be careful about that, but just leave the outcome of it to the wise and loving Heavenly Father who guided him all the way along, from the little old farm with the big mortgage on it, away up there in the mountains, till he placed him on one of the highest pedestals of power in the land.

But let us not shelter ourselves behind the mayor. All of us are at a critical stage just now, for all of us have just entered upon a New Year. And it is a year of stress and storm, too. Never have we known such a year. As President Wilson said, we used to prepare armies for war, now we prepare nations. This whole nation is at war. Every householder, every individual, feels it. Oh, what a call it is for us to draw near to God!

And this Psalm tells us how to do it. It tells us to begin by singing of God's mercy and judgment. We can do that even though we are at war, even though we have loved ones far away, "somewhere in France," for there is a bright side even to war. Thousands of young men who would never darken the door of a Gospel meeting are now listening to the Gospel, we are told, and are getting saved. One young English lad wrote home to his father from the trenches saying, "Dad, this war had to be that I might be saved!" His father was reading the letter to a friend of ours, and said: "Just fancy our George thinking that God would cause, or permit, all this upheaval that he might be saved!" "Ah," replied our friend, "God upheaved more than all Europe that your George might be saved. Calvary was a greater tragedy than this war, and Calvary had to be that I might be saved." Oh, yes, we can sing of mercy and judgment if we know what redemption is!

THIS Psalm tells us as a consequence of God's mercy and judgment to walk within our house with a perfect heart. "In the integrity of my heart" is really what David says. With an undivided, entire, sincere purpose let us serve God in every part of our being and every channel of our life this year. Of course, the word is used relatively. No man since the fall of Adam, save Jesus Christ, ever walked perfectly before God in the absolute sense. David's practice indeed did not always tally with his resolve; but he made the resolve, and that was something. To be perfect even as our Father in heaven is perfect may surpass our most sanguine expectations; but to set before us any lower standard is to demoralize Christian effort, to reject Christ, and to invite defeat.

But following the sign-posts of the Psalm further, we find that to walk within our house with a perfect heart means two things chiefly. First, renunciation of every known wicked thing; and secondly, separation as far as possible from every wicked person.

"Each heart knoweth its own bitterness," says the wise man, "and a stranger doth not intermeddle with its joy" (Prov. 14 : 10). Which means, for our present purpose, that you know better than any one else just what the "wicked thing" is toward which you have a predilection. It may be some false system of religion, some form of that Babylonianism or paganism of the East which of late has engrafted itself upon the Christian thinking of our land. You will know it by its earmark of opposition to the Gospel of salvation through faith in the atonement of Jesus Christ. It may be that your "wicked thing" is of a more social character; some feeling of hatred, malice or uncharitableness toward your fellow man; some illicit love you cherish; some unfairness or dishonesty in trade; some falsehood in speech or life; some covetous desire or consuming ambition that is certain to lead into overt sin. If "thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God," these things must in purpose of heart be put away.

BUT the renunciation of every known wicked thing will lead very directly to separation as far as possible from every wicked person. "As far as possible," we say; for some qualification is required here. Paul wrote to the Corinthian Christians not to keep company with fornicators, but what he meant was fornicators in the church; "if any man that is called a (Christian) brother be a fornicator, . . . with such an one no not to eat" (I Cor. 5 : 9-13). He admitted that they would have to keep some kind of company with fornicators in the world or they must "needs go out of the world." And the same is true of other classes of the wicked and ungodly. Alas! the world is full of infidels, and blasphemers, and Sabbath-breakers, and home-disrupters, and heart-murderers, and adulterers, and thieves, and liars, and all the rest; and absolutely to separate one's self from them is a physical impossibility. But when David said, "A froward heart shall depart from me; I will not know a wicked person," he had in mind his friends and companions, and his associates in the government where his freedom of choice came into play. And this is the obligation that concerns us. Remember, too, that oftentimes our most intimate and influential companions are those of printer's ink, and if our eyes are to be only "upon the faithful of the land," then our reading is to be winnowed out from the daily newspaper to the most lordly literature upon our library shelves.

Oh, as we dwell on these obligations and the weakness of our own hearts, how much we need to cry to God as David did, "Oh, when wilt thou come unto me?" "Old Adam is too strong for young Melancthon," said the great reformer. "Self is not powerful enough to conquer self," said A. J. Gordon. It is only when by the Holy Spirit we do mortify the deeds of the body that we shall live (Rom. 8 : 13). Therefore, by an act of our will let us yield ourselves to him, that he may perform his full and holy work within us.

IMMORTALITY

By J. Corson Miller

NAY, scorn me not, O mighty wind-lashed sea.
Nor ye stupendous mountains, proudly strong.
If I do seek to sanctify with song
My heart's high hope of immortality.
Not thus engulfed shall my brave vision be
By thunder-throated storms; count me not wrong.
Ye parrot-praters that great cities throng,
Enchained in darkness, though your feet are free.

Come, nourish me, my Dream. I would sweep on,
Like some bold-winged bird, to heights divine,
Assured that I shall one day meet with mine—
My father waiting anxiously at dawn;
Beside him, lo, her mother-eyes ashine,
My childhood's guardian angel who is gone.

Heroic Goodness

SUNDAY, January 13. John 5:35: "He was a burning and a shining light." It is the combination of the two words "burning" and "shining" which portrays so distinguished and powerful a character. If either word be bereft of the other the character it describes is ineffective. Light without heat! Who has not met the impotence? Heat without light! Who has not met the terror? It is the fellowship of the two which generates a fruitful power. The two together produce a luminous enthusiasm. We have zeal wedded to knowledge. We have an enlightened faith in communion with a passionate love. It is only when our souls have the double guardianship of light and heat that our life can be said to be safe. If I may so put it, we have the security of incandescence.

Now I think that the element which is more commonly absent from our religious life is the element of heat. The majority of us know all that we need to know to be in the heavenly way, but we do not make much pace or progress. We are short of heat. There is nothing more annoying than to have to maintain a smoldering fire. It is always just on the point of going out. We stir it up and it sputters and flickers for a moment, but it soon becomes dull again. It is something like trying to keep the dormouse awake in Alice's Wonderland. On the other hand a big, well-fed fire maintains its life by its own fervor. Its very passion is its defense. Its heat is its security. And so it is with the aspirations of the soul. So it is with all piety and devotion. If they are of the smoldering order our religious life will be more an annoyance than a strength and comfort. We shall always have to be attending to it, just as we watch an invalid. But if our religious life is of the burning and shining order, blazing with holy consecration and enthusiasm, the fire itself will be our best protection. Our ardor will be our friend.

Here is a sentence of Coventry Palmore's, one of the many jottings which were found in manuscript after his death: "If you wish to be good, the easiest, indeed the only, way is to be heroically so." That is profoundly true. We are not going to be commonly good until we are uncommonly devoted to goodness. That is to say, the easiest way to do God's will on the ordinary road is to bring to each task and duty a life of uttermost consecration. It is only the really full life that will make little things live. If there is to be the heroic flavor in our ordinary fellowships it must be born out of a supremely surrendered life to the fellowship of God in Christ our Lord. We are too prone to try to be good on a perilously low pressure, and we cannot get along. There is no strength in our goodness. We are not impressive. It makes no mark. It cannot burn a trail! There is not heat enough. If we had more heat, if we were baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire, the ordinary things of the ordinary day would pulse with the power of holy consecration.

Our Unseen Companion

MONDAY, January 14. Isa. 41:10: "Fear thou not; for I am with thee; he not dismayed; for I am thy God." Daniel was not alone with the lions in their den. The three youths were not alone in the blazing furnace. Paul and Silas were not alone in the Philippian dungeon. Elijah was not alone when he stood before Ahab. Indeed, he was more conscious of Another than he was of the Oriental despot who was his inquisitor at that moment. He said so when he began his address with the words, "As the Lord God liveth, before whom I stand." Luther was not alone at the Diet, though he seemed to be. No man is alone who protests against ancient iniquity, who lifts up his voice against error, who pleads for humanity and God. Humanity, the unseen, stands by such a man, and God, though invisible, is his present and eternal partner. "Fear not, for I am with thee."

Mrs. Burnett tells us of a poor girl in London who was always trusting "Something she knew was Up There." Pollyanna belongs to the same school. A little book called "That Something" teaches the same lesson. A man who had been bankrupt in every way, but who had experienced the birth of a new manhood, applied for a position. Before he was accepted he went to work, did all the duties of the place he had applied for, acted as though he had already become a part of the concern, displayed no over-anxiety as to his wages, and became indispensable to the business. Step by step he went up to a place of prominence and power, relying on "That Something." "That Something" is no vague abstraction. It towers above our lives. It fills our lives. It encompasses our lives. It is God. When we claim him as our companion every moment, life begins to wear a new habit, and day and night our souls shall sing their song of hope: "I am with thee; I am thy God."

Just Judgment

TUESDAY, January 15. 1 Cor. 4:5: "Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall every man have praise of God." The speaker is the same apostle who declared himself "the chief of sinners." The judgment, then, which he deprecates in this place cannot refer to questions of right and wrong. On such matters he himself had taught the congregation at Corinth to pass judgment, and had declared that "the spiritual man judgeth all things." He refers in this passage to the hasty judgment which immature minds were passing on the relative merit of the ministry of various servants of the Lord. These were not free from personal bias. They did not take in all the evidence in the case. They apportioned praise and blame on arbitrary grounds and for selfish reasons.

It requires a good conscience in one's own cause and a true faith in the justice of the Lord for a public servant of the church thus to pass calmly through evil report and good report and look for the final revision of men's judgments by the Supreme Court of heaven. If men would be concerned only about the approval or disapproval of the Lord, they would not mind man's judgment.

The Passing World

WEDNESDAY, January 16. John 18:36: "My kingdom is not of this world." If there is no other world, there is no world here worth living for. Is it not the heavenly that gives reality to the earthly, that helps us rightly to estimate life's real value? Does it not take two worlds to complete the circle of being, and is not the present only a little arc in that endless circle?

How difficult it seems for some persons to realize that this world passeth away, but that the world kingdom of Christ endureth forever! His followers are pilgrims and strangers, seeking a better country, expecting the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory that shall be revealed. Truly, the journey of life is only an episode before entering upon the great hereafter. Reaching the confines of the undiscovered country and crossing its threshold is a supreme moment, the climax of human destiny. Some regard the ornamentation of the chariot that carries us as the chief occupation of the traveler; but social betterment should always be secondary to soul betterment. The one is external; the other, eternal beauty of character. Earthly comforts and riches have not yet made men holier. All social service, intellectual culture, philanthropic endeavor, and love of the beautiful should center in Christ and become active through his indwelling. How we live is more important than how long we live or how happily. Seek first his everlasting kingdom, and all lesser good will be added.

Life's Sweet Surprises

THURSDAY, January 17. Luke 24:35: "He was known to them in the breaking of bread." Nothing is more certain than that God reveals himself to men in myriad ways: as comfort to the stricken; as strength to the fainting; as wisdom to the ignorant; as rest to the weary; as refreshment to the languid; as inspiration to the halting; as light to the blind; as awakening to the jaded spirit. The moments of these revelations are the golden moments of our life. Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, recovering from a long and painful illness, had an experience which he never spoke of but with a strange degree of guardedness. His experience was one of God's intimate nearness. He knew something of the meaning of the holy promise, "I will come in and sup with him and he with me." There was a missionary in the early history of Canada to whom there came a vision such as that which tradition says Constantine saw in the sky. This missionary says he saw a luminous cross. Some one asked him how large it was, and he replied, "Large enough to crucify us all on." Sometimes workers in difficult fields, in crises of their lives, have such revelations. It is as though the Infinite Father, keeping his eyes on all his children, stoops to touch them and to lift them up when he sees them passing through periods of darkness and danger. The suddenness of such revelations, their unexpectedness, links them in thought with the radiant and memorable moment when Jesus made himself known to two of his disciples in the breaking of bread. The element of surprise in religious experience is well expressed in a line of an old hymn, "And every joy He brings me comes a new and glad surprise."

Speedy Sentence

FRIDAY, January 18. Eccles. 8:11: "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." During the initial stages of wrongdoing sinners often remain unpunished. The secular courts can punish but a very small part of all the wrong that is committed against the laws of the commonwealth, because by far the greater part of wrongful acts remain undiscovered. Private rebuke is not always administered as it should be, because men do not wish to appear harsh and censorious. But also God delays his punishment. The conscience which he has placed in men indeed reproves them for the wrong which they commit, but the sinner fails to connect the accusations of the little voice within him with God. He imagines that he is immune from punishment, and continues sinning with greater boldness. His whole life finally becomes a daring challenge to divine justice to apprehend him and stop him in his mad career. The pious look on, and wonder whether God is sleeping.

But the tardiness of God merely exhibits the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long suffering; he would give the sinner time to reconsider his evil ways and would lead him to repentance. He has a thousand ways for making the sinner aware that he is pursuing an evil course and is headed for destruction.

Paul's Friends

SATURDAY, January 19. II Tim. 4:16, 17: "No man stood with me, but the Lord stood with me." Paul at Athens and Corinth had to face unbelieving audiences alone. He deeply felt the need of an associate in sympathy with his work and himself. Demas had forsaken him; Mark had turned back; Alexander did him much evil; Silas and Timothy had not yet arrived. So Paul, the noble apostle, had to stand alone among strangers, preaching the new Gospel.

Athens was called the eye of Greece and Greece the eye of the whole Gentile world. Paul had failed to impress Athens; would he repeat that failure at Corinth? These were no doubt among his thoughts as he approached the city in trembling and in solitude. How much he felt the need of Christian fellowship and friendship in that critical hour! True, the Lord stood by him and strengthened him, but the soul craves companionship from those who are on a plane with humanity. Paul was a preacher of tender and affectionate nature. To some converts he once wrote, "Now we live if ye stand fast in the Lord." The Epistle to the Philippians is a sweet love-letter where he says, "My longing for, my joy and crown, my dearly beloved." Oh, how Paul hungered for such fellowship, which was next to holding communion with Christ himself! Once he wrote Timothy, "Do thy diligence to come unto me; take Mark and bring him with thee, and salute all the brethren in the Lord for me."

Paul's friends were fellow workers, true Christian soldiers; he had little sympathy with those who turned back. He was so enraptured with Jesus that he could not have close friendship among those who were not like-minded. He wanted to mingle with those who are all one in the Saviour's sanctuary. "As thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, so may they be one in us."

Dr. Jordan on Autocracy

IN his contribution to the symposium on "The Church After the War," printed in this issue of the Christian Herald, President Jordan of Leland Stanford University, amid many strong passages has one which seems almost lifted up to the domain of prophecy. At the root of the present world-troubles, he finds autocracy:

It is my firm belief that the root of international war is found in the dynastic system of national organization. To center all power in the hands of one man puts the people at the mercy of the oligarchy of parasites and satellites which surround the autocrat, and which must always constitute "the power behind the throne." On this group of self-seekers and intriguers, religion can make no impression. They are ready enough with lip-service and its varied forms of blasphemy. But religion can be effective only as it replaces lip-service by realities. The people have been nothing; they must be everything; and Democracy is the political expression of the Beatitudes.

Lincoln had the same thought in mind when he wrote and spoke in eulogy and respect for the sovereignty of the "plain people." Emerson, too, had it when he wrote "God said, I am tired of kings." Tennyson voiced the same sentiment when he foreshadowed the coming "parliament of man, the federation of the world." President Wilson expressed it in the now famous passage, declaring that the present war must "make the world safe for democracy," and that the truth of democracy is "the air all governments must breathe henceforth if they would live."

But the conviction of the failure of autocracy to meet the requirements and assure the welfare of the race is as old as history itself. When Israel was a young and growing nation, under the Judges, dazzled by the barbaric splendor and gilded wickedness of the heathen courts of that time, the people became ashamed of their little plain republic and clamored for a king. God, speaking through Moses, gave what should have been accepted as sufficient warning. Read the story in I Samuel eighth chapter, and note the predictions which were fulfilled later. And history abounds in parallel experiences where autocracies, grasping at unlimited power, have ruled only to ruin. They are a menace to the whole world, their own people included, and their ultimate overthrow comes about through the operation of a law that is inexorable. It is the simple law of justice which is written in the human heart everywhere, and which at the last arouses the whole world against the aggressor.

In these days of shallow thinking, it is refreshing to find here and there some one who can sound the depths of a problem without losing his head in the effort. President Jordan's dignified and patriotic treatment of the whole question at issue will be read with general approval.

Heroism in Women

WHENEVER a woman does some courageous act not strictly in line with women's ordinary activities, all men hasten to pay her tribute. If she flags an imperiled train with her red petticoat, takes a gun to a burglar, or smashes a "masher," we at once go into high panegyrics over her heroism. In the impulse of enthusiastic admiration men magnanimously admit for the moment that women may, on occasion, be as brave as men always are.

At the head of this type of womanly intrepidity stand the few famous girls who, as keepers of lighthouses, have saved the lives of scores in adjacent waters. Close to these in admiration of the public are the noble women who go as nurses to the front and into fever-infected places. And there is the Chicago society woman who the other day stopped a stampede in a theater fire.

These are brave women indeed, and admiration for them is genuine and irresistible. But is the selection of such instances as these as types of womanly heroism fair to women in general? Not all women can be lighthouse-keepers, or war nurses, or society women at theater fires. Most of them are home-keepers. Are we to ignore the heroism with which they perform their everyday tasks? Are we to overlook the unselfishness and courage of their daily sacrifice in these troubled times?

It is quite well for us to admire the women who go to nurse the mangled and dying. But what about the countless other women who bravely send husbands, brothers, lovers, sons, to be mangled and killed?

Who can ever count the hours that the mothers of the world have spent in lonely vigil when despair pressed upon them and closed round about them like a midnight gloom? Does one ever hear of a mother that fails or forgets or falters?

But these mothers, wives and sweethearts, supremely brave in their bereavement, are so common that we take no note of them. The truth is that we are so used to heroism in women that we think nothing about it until it presents itself spectacularly in some unusual form.

Roosevelt Favors National Prohibition

EX-PRESIDENT THEODORE ROOSEVELT, in a letter dated December 19, 1917, has just declared for the first time his endorsement of National Prohibition as the solution of the drink problem in this country. Dr. Iglehart had sent the Colonel a copy of his new book, "King Alcohol Dethroned," just published by the Christian Herald, and received the following acknowledgment:

MY DEAR DR. IGLEHART: I thank you for your book and appreciate your sending it to me, and I wish to congratulate you on what has happened in Congress and the success that is crowning your long fight against alcoholism. The American saloon has been one of the most mischievous elements in American social, political and industrial life. No man has warred more valiantly against it than you have, and I am glad that it has been my privilege to stand with you in the contest.

Faithfully yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

For many years the Colonel has denounced the evils of the American saloon. Early in the present conflict he demanded war prohibition in the interest of military and naval efficiency, but has never till now come out unreservedly in favor of National Constitutional Prohibition. His letter will be hailed with delight by the millions of temperance people all over the country, who are wrought up to the white heat of enthusiasm on the subject, and who will hope that the announcement from Oyster Bay will hasten the swift destruction of the liquor traffic.

Concerning Prophecy

IN dealing with every great question, preceptancy should be avoided. This is especially true as applied to the conclusions to be drawn from the study of prophecy. While the conviction is general among Biblical scholars everywhere that we are living in times of prophetic fulfillment, all well-regulated and devout Christian scholarship will exercise the greatest care to avoid the pitfall into which many students of prophecy have fallen in the past. We refer to the setting of dates, even approximately, upon which the events foretold may be expected to take place. Minds have been wrecked, splendid reputations spoiled, and multitudes misled by such a course.

While it is the duty and the privilege of all to study the Scriptures, it must be manifest that rash conclusions are a positive danger in this particular field. Regarding certain unfulfilled prophecies, it is clearly set forth in the Bible that only those who are spiritually enlightened can understand, while the greatest theme of all—the Second Coming—is accompanied by the declaration from Jesus' own lips that of the day and hour (of fulfillment) no man knoweth. This warning is followed by the injunction to watch, to pray, and to so live that we may be found in readiness.

A Splendid Tribute

AN old man of ninety-one, fragile in frame but with a mind crystal-clear in its perceptions, recently thrilled all England with a letter which he wrote to the London Times. The title he chose for his subject was a singular one: "The Return of the Mayflower." In the first few sentences, the idea he had in mind burst upon the readers like a splendid sunrise. The Mayflower, carrying ninety-eight courageous souls, sailed out upon a trackless sea—"for conscience' sake." It came back, a mighty argosy, ready to take up the great world-struggle alongside of the Allies—also "for conscience' sake." In both cases—the going and the coming—there was the same high motive, the love of liberty, justice, democracy.

There are thoughts so beautiful that they cannot die. Solon, before the Athenian Senate on his defense, lifted up a hand filled with the soil. "This black earth be my witness," he cried, letting it filter slowly through his fingers to the ground, "that I have labored to free the soil of Greece to her sons." Every Greek and half the world know these immortal words.

So the old Bishop of Marlborough, when he welcomed the coming of the fleet "of the mightiest Republic the world has ever seen" as "the Return of the Mayflower," expressed a thought at once so lofty and so noble that it deserves to be imperishable. It should serve as an inspiration to all who would follow the highest ideals, for it is by devotion to the true ideal that the world must make progress.

To Those Who Have Not Yet Renewed

WE would urgently advise every one of our readers who has not yet sent in a renewal for 1918, to do so at the earliest possible moment. In common with other publications, the Christian Herald is confronted with a further advance in the cost of mailing the publication to all parts of the United States. Congress has already passed a law which increases the cost of mailing the publication by over three times. It is proposed to put this law into operation by July first. The publishers are using every endeavor to have this law repealed, and some of the Senators and Congressmen are in favor of a repeal, because they feel it is an unjust burden not only on the publishers but on the people who take the publication, since many publishers will be forced to raise their subscription prices to meet the additional tax.

It may be that Congress will repeal it, and it may be that another law will be substituted for it, which may bring about an advance even sooner than was contemplated in the law already enacted. There seems to be nothing certain about it except the fact that there will be an advance. Certainly there can be no possible reduction from the price of last year. We would like to have all of our friends who have not renewed to do so before the end of January. Do the safe thing and renew now. It would please us very much to complete our list of January renewals.

We have been greatly gratified by the way in which our friends have stood by us through past crises of this kind. The month of December and those immediately preceding it have been especially successful. We would like to make a record month of January. We would like it to surpass December.

Will you not make sure that you are to receive the Christian Herald for next year by sending in your renewal at once? Furthermore, you doubtless know of some friend who would be interested in receiving such an all around, serviceable, attractive and well-illustrated paper as the Christian Herald. Try to induce him to send his subscription in with your own. Through such cooperation from our readers we look forward to a larger Family Circle this year than ever.

Character in Camp Life

ONE of the most gratifying developments of the year now closing is the splendid effort that is being made by the government and the churches of all denominations, with the cooperation of Christian people everywhere, to keep alive the religious spirit and good morals in the military camps. As this movement has progressed, it has been marked by an increased sense of responsibility on the part of those in authority. In a recent address to the officers and men at Fort Benjamin Harrison, William Jennings Bryan set forth, in language that deserves to be remembered, the moral responsibilities of leadership.

"You are given charge of men who are gathered from among your countrymen. No boy will go back home just as he came into the army. Its members can not stand still. Every human being is moving every day and every hour, up toward the highest plane to which man can attain, or down toward the lowest level to which a man can fall. . . . This nation is putting into your hands the priceless citizenship of the land, and if God spares the lives of these men, and permits them to return, your country will demand of you that they shall come back better men and not worse for their association with you."

Progress either in the right direction or in the wrong is a law in the natural as well as the spiritual world. All of us are subject to it. We are either progressing upward, or retrogressing—going downward. In the personal records of camp life that will reach many thousands of home circles, none can give a deeper or truer satisfaction than those that tell of camps that have been marked by the observance of sound moral principles and where every opportunity has been given for the fulfillment of religious duties. Many a sore and anxious heart will be made lighter by the knowledge that the sons and brothers who responded to their country's call are at least in an atmosphere which is not hostile to the upward growth of character.

The World's Sugar Famine

Frank Carpenter Tells How Americans by Economizing in Sugar Can Help Win the War

Copyright 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE sugar industry has gone under the control of the government, and the Food Administration urges that each of us cut down the amount of sugar he is using in his tea and coffee and in candies and cake, so that we may have a greater supply to send to our allies in Europe. There is a sugar famine in France, England and Italy, and the ration now given to the French soldiers in the trenches is not more than a small lump per day. Many of the people of France have no sugar at all, and Mr. Hoover has promised to ship them 100,000 tons as soon as the stuff can be sent over the ocean. The amount the English are using now averages only about one ounce every twenty-four hours, and the Italians have a still shorter supply.

The value of sugar to the soldier in the field is well known to the Germans. Long before this war began they made experiments which showed that the men could do more work and stand more hardships if they had a liberal allowance of sugar. On the long marches it was found that it appeased hunger and mitigated thirst, and that while the men without sugar dropped on the way, none of those supplied with it were overcome by exhaustion. The sugar users were found to have a better pulse rate, and their breathing was less affected by over-exertion.

It was on the basis of these experiments that the German surgeons recommended that the sugar ration for the army be increased, and that it be given the men in their coffee and in preserves or honey or in sweetened food. At the beginning of this war the Germans tried to reduce the size of their sugar crop in order to use more of the ground for potatoes and cereals. The result was a shortage of sugar, which affected the army. The second year they planted more beets, and they have now resumed the old sugar rations.

INDEED, the beet sugar industry was started owing to the sugar needs of an army. It was when Napoleon Bonaparte was at war with England and the ports of France were so blockaded that there was no sugar for the French soldiers. Some years previous to that a scientist named Margraf had discovered that beets contained sugar, and later on a pupil of his named Achard established the first beet sugar factory. He announced the success of his experiments to the Scientific Institute of France in 1799, and a little later Napoleon tried to sweeten his army with beets. At any rate he offered a prize of 100,000 francs, or $20,000, to any one who would make a success of extracting sugar from beets, and the result was a number of factories. During the next decade the Germans began to experiment along the same lines, and their government offered bounties of so much per pound on all beet sugar made in their country. These movements formed the foundation of the beet sugar industry of Europe, which when this war began was yielding almost one-half of the sugar supply of the world. The amount then made was enough to give ten pounds to every man, woman and child upon earth. The sugar beet can be raised in a large part of the temperate zone, and it is a question whether, after the war is ended, the beet sugar product will not surpass the cane sugar product. At present the land in the two crops is about equal. The world over, there are now something like 6,000,000 acres devoted to cane every year and about 6,000,000 acres devoted to the sugar beet. The total area in sugar is thus about 12,000,000 acres.

Sugar came to this continent with Columbus. He is said to have planted it in Santo Domingo in 1493. A little later it was introduced into Cuba, and after negro slavery was inaugurated there the industry rapidly grew. In the seventeenth century, when the island had only 50,000 people, it had 100 sugar plantations. Today Cuba produces more sugar than any other part of the world. Its crop last year was about 6,000,000,000 pounds, in comparison with India a little more than 5,000,000,000 and Java about 2,500,- 000,000. During that year Europe produced 10,000,000,000 pounds of beet sugar, the product coming mainly from Germany, Austria and Russia, with smaller amounts from Belgium and France. All of these countries formerly exported sugar to England, and this supply has, of course, been cut off.

AS to cane sugar, it is raised in scattering patches throughout the tropical world. I have seen the cane growing in Porto Rico, Cuba, and other of the West India islands. Some of the finest sugar lands of a part of the sugar in them goes out into the tanks, which are filled with warm water, and at the end of the process all of the sugar has gone into the water. At the start the water is as clear as crystal, but when it flows forth, containing the sugar, it is as black as ink, and it has to be purified before being boiled down to get out the sugar. This is done by various processes, which make the sugar water as clear as pure alcohol. The water is now passed through tanks filled with steam pipes, the liquid growing thicker and thicker until it turns to a sirup and then to a mixture of sugar and molasses.

This mixture is refined in about the same way as cane sugar, and at the end it becomes the sweet, white stuff we use on our tables. It is now just like cane sugar. Pure sugar is the same everywhere, and no pure sugars are sweeter than others.

And now let us see what we can do to help the sugar famine in Europe. The Food Administration will do all in its power, but it depends upon you and me, and the other people of the United States, as to whether we can ship a goodly supply of sugar to the soldiers and our allies this winter. It depends upon how much candy we eat and how we gorge ourselves with cakes, pies, puddings and other desserts. It depends upon whether we each use one or two lumps or no sugar at all in our coffee and tea, for all these make up a large part of our sugar consumption, which today is the greatest of the whole world.

Do you know how much sugar we eat every year? Our average consumption, taking every man, woman and child in the United States into account, is ninety pounds, or almost two pounds per week. During the ten years preceding the war our consumption was only seventy or eighty pounds. We then ate on the average only 7,000,000,000 pounds per year, which was an increase over the consumption of the preceding decade of about 43 per cent. It is not very long since we were each eating only sixty pounds per year, and if we should cut down our ration to the same amount we formerly used we would have plenty of sugar for any one of our allies. As it is now, the French people have been living on twenty-one pounds per year and the English and Italians have not more than that. We are now eating about twenty pounds each in excess of our average consumption during the last ten years, and thirty pounds more than during the ten years before that.

Ninety pounds of sugar for each one of us and twenty-one pounds for each Englishman, Frenchman and Italian! How would you like to sit down at a partnership dinner with three other people and have one of them grab three-fourths of the sugar? That is just what we have been doing in 1917.

IF we could reduce our consumption one-half we should still each have more than twice as much as is used by our allies, and the saving would be 4,500,000,000 pounds. If we could reduce it one-fourth we should still have three times as much as either the English, French or Italians, and there would be 1,500,000,000 pounds saved for shipment to Europe. To do that we should each have to save about one ounce of sugar a day, or seven ounces per week the year through.

Take the single item of candy. If all the sugar we use in making confectionery could be sent to Italy it would double that country's supply. In 1917 we spent for candy twice as much as is needed to buy Belgium its food supply for one year. The amount of sugar we use in making confectionery is in the neighborhood of 800,000,000 pounds per annum, and this sold at the low rate of 25 cents per pound equals $200,000,000. In fact, we are now spending two-thirds as much for our candy as for butter, and one-third as much as for our wheat flour. If the women and children could cut their candy consumption in half, we should have hundreds of millions of pounds more sugar for export. Moreover, candy is the most expensive form in which sugar is sold.

Are you saving sugar? Here are four ways to do it the world are the volcanic soil of Hawaii and Java, and we have millions of acres in the Philippines that might be used for the crop. British India has at times led the world in cane-sugar production, and the crop of Java is so great that it has now a surplus of 1,600,000,000 pounds for export. It is tied up there because the merchant vessels belonging to the Dutch, which usually bring the sugar to the United States and Europe, have been kept in New York owing to our refusal to give them cargoes of grain to carry across the ocean to Europe.

Our cane sugar area is confined to Louisiana and Texas. The sugar lands there are comparatively limited, and we shall not be able to grow enough cane sugar for our needs, outside our colonial possessions. It is different with the Philippines, Hawaii and Porto Rico and the new islands we have recently bought from Denmark. They all have good sugar soil, and the Philippines could feed a large part of our people.

As to our beet-sugar area, it is so great that we could grow enough beets to supply every pound of sugar we use and still have a surplus to sell to other parts of the world. The sugar beet can be grown anywhere from Maine to California and from the Great Lakes to the Ohio River. It needs cool nights and moderately warm days, and it thrives best along the isothermal line of 70 degrees. I have seen it in Utah and California, where are some of the largest beet-sugar fields of the world.

The beets are not large. They weigh from a pound to a pound and a half each, and the smallest beet has the sweetest juice and makes the best sugar. The beets produce more or less sugar according to the percentage of sugar contents in them. This varies in different localities. In the region I visited it took six or eight beets to make one pound of sugar.

I WAS interested in the beet-sugar factories. They have modern machinery based upon cost efficiency methods, so that a minimum of human labor is used. The beets are taken in upon belts and carried to the top of the factory, being washed on the way. They are cut into little pieces by knives which slice them into bits the width and thickness of a slate pencil.

After cutting the threads go into great iron tanks containing diffusion batteries so arranged that they move through from one tank to the others. The machinery is so constructed that, as the beets go through,

The Church After the War

More Views from Pastors and Laymen on the Duty of Preparing for a Great Opportunity

[There is a wide variety of views, clerical and lay, in the second group of contributions on "The Church After the War," which appears below. Like the first installment, they represent both denominational and non-denominational opinion, but while differing in detail, they uniformly agree in the conclusion that the Church must sink her differences and unite her forces, to meet the opportunity after the war for a restored influence and augmented spiritual power.]

The Church Must Replace Lip Service by Realities and Teach Brotherly Love to the World, writes President David Starr Jordan

RELIGION has not prevented war because it has had no chance either to prevent it or to stop it. The forces behind this war, the desire for dynastic supremacy, the desire to dominate by slaughter and terrorism, the greed for iron mines, sea-ports and colonies, lie beyond the reach of religious influences. They are unqualifiedly pagan. They belong not to our modern civilization of altruism, but to the times of Alexander and Belshazzar. This is no people's war, and in its inception it is no part of the twentieth century. Our nation with the others has seen fit to meet force with counter force. Whatever the outcome, there is a vast moral difference between war for prestige and conquests, and war for defense with no hope of gain. The motives of the Allied nations, as a whole, have been primarily unselfish, whatever may be said of individuals within their ranks. They accord with the ancient maxim of the Puritans, "Opposition to tyrants is obedience to God."

It is true that every country has its war-apologists, war-makers and war-prophets, some of them using the phrases of religion, but in one nation alone have these risen to the seat of power. The people of Germany did not incite the war, but those at the head of her government were certainly responsible, and actual peace can come only when the German people honestly demand it. Here, religion should find her opportunity.

And by religion I must mean personal devotion and piety. Nothing can be expected from a state church. State churches are concerned mainly with uniformity and discipline of the flock. Religion scorns uniformity, and builds up its discipline from within.

It is my firm belief that the root of international war is found in the dynastic system of national organization. To center all power in the hands of one man puts the people at the mercy of the oligarchy of parasites and satellites which surround the autocrat and which must always constitute "the power behind the throne." On this group of self-seekers and intriguers religion can make no impression. They are ready enough at lip-service and its varied forms of blasphemy. But religion can be effective only as it replaces lip-service by realities. The people have been nothing; they must be everything; and democracy is the political expression of the Beatitudes.

There is but one enduring power capable of holding a nation together—the cement of brotherly love. And it is the main political function of religion to furnish this cement. Empires rise and fall; nations held in order by force and terrorism break up into their constituent parts; but no people ever lost its liberties through excess of brotherly love. And notwithstanding the awful havoc made by the clash of political ideals, the spirit of mutual aid was never so strong in the human race as today. Religion is not to be tested by its failure to prevent a world-catastrophe. Science, finance, education, all other influences, good and bad, failed likewise, because they had not yet struck the tap-root of evil—the irresponsible rule of kings.

It serves no purpose to blame religion or the Church for what they have not accomplished. Let us stress rather what they have done. Everywhere the power of Christian altruism is felt. Scarcely a living soul lies wholly outside its influence. It has spread the feeling of love and sympathy and justice throughout the world, even though it has not made these virtues universal. The privilege-haunted royal courts are the last places to be reached, and in these is the seat of war. This is a very tough old world, not to be subdued in a day nor in a thousand years; but brotherly love makes great headway. Science, the consummate fruit of altruism, has made the earth an economic as well as an intellectual unit. Religion joins it in making the whole world kin. The collective crimes of mankind have been, one by one, brought to the bar of "the great court that sits in silence, the heart and conscience of universal humanity."

There is the continuous opportunity of religion. Its leaders should represent and interpret this universal conscience, in the future, as its seers and prophets have done through the long past. And there must be an enlightened and enlightening interpretation. It avails nothing to shout with the multitude. The prophet must stand on his own feet, "with his own head under his own hat"; he must study for himself; he must do his own thinking; he must search his own heart to distinguish principle from prudence. He may not keep step on the march, because, as Thoreau once suggested, "he hears a different drummer." His patriotism, like his religion, must not be a matter of dress, slogan, music or fireworks. He must love his country even as he loves his fellow men. He must be ready to "shatter the folkways" when these lead not toward higher things. He must be true to the highest ideals of the republic, which should be indeed the beacon-light of a world oppressed by greed and sham and terror. He must visualize the long future. Through all the confusion of the human world, and the sordid walk and talk of squalid men, he should never lose sight of "the vision, changeless as the stars, That shone through palace-gates or prison bars.

Or the lone Body nailed upon the tree,

Through each mean discord of the Life that is.

The vision of the Life that yet Shall Be!"

The Church Must Do Her Christ-Appointed Work with Redoubled Passion and Power, writes Dr. Jefferson, of Broadway Tabernacle

THE greatest service which the Church can render to the nation in time of war is a spiritual service. Her supreme work in peace and in war is to keep the soul alive.

War is a great demoralizer. It upsets moral values. It absorbs the minds and hearts of men, and fixes attention on physical forces and instruments. There is never a religious revival during a war, or at the end of one. A nation is demoralized by war, and so also is the Church.

It behooves the Church, therefore, in these perilous days to give herself with redoubled energy to the work which Christ has appointed her. She must proclaim the Gospel with passion and power. She must put new heart into men. She must fortify soldiers against the deadly temptations of the camp. She must comfort the anxious and heavy-hearted. She must bind up the wounds of those who are bleeding and half dead. She must be the Good Samaritan. She must be the great Consoler. She must be the intrepid inspirer of faith and hope and love.

CHARLES E. JEFFERSON,

Let the Church Humble Herself Before God, and He Will Raise Up Leaders and Give Victory, writes Dr. Munhall

WITHOUT doubt the present unparalleled war has raised questions of tremendous importance for the Christian Church to solve that can best be solved, if at all, by concerted action. Unquestionably other problems of as great, if not greater, importance will arise before the end of this awful strife is reached, and still others later. Will the Church respond to the demand upon her and be equal to it? We all sincerely hope so. Humanly speaking, she has well-nigh everything necessary to enable her to make good, gloriously good! Her greatest difficulty lies in the fact that, organically, she is divided into so very many camps. Organic unity of Christendom is a dream that will not come true in this age. If Protestantism could by any possible means be united under one ecclesiastical head, it and Rome could never be induced to see eye to eye. And yet we all acknowledge the sovereign Lordship of Jesus and the office and work of the Holy Ghost; and having "the mind of the Master," we love our fellow man; and being American citizens, we are patriots and will follow the starry flag.

A generation ago we got together for much good in the "Evangelical Alliance," but it is of the past and well-nigh forgotten. Other organizations have since been formed with the very best of intentions, which have done some good; but for lack of proper leadership or management they have proved unequal to the great demands now upon us. Wise and good men have spent much time in considering this matter, and said and written much that is worth while; but we have not yet a satisfactory solution of all our difficulties.

What shall we do? For one, I believe we most need the wisdom that is from above. The Church needs in this dark hour—and there may be darker ahead—to humble herself before God, put away her formality, her pride, her selfishness and worldliness, and penitentially confess and forsake her sins. If she will do this, God, the God of Nations, even our God, will without doubt undertake for us. Then let the ministers of Jesus stick closely to their divinely appointed work, and stop trying to run the government, conduct the war and settle all the economic and social problems of the day—as not a few do.

Sin is at the bottom of all our troubles. But for it, there would be no war. Almighty God has provided, at infinite cost, a sovereign and all-sufficient remedy for sin in the shed blood of his only begotten Son, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. And what this old sin-scarred and war-torn world needs more than all things besides, is the Gospel of the Grace of God.

If the churches will humble themselves before God, confess their sins and put away their idols; and if the ambassadors of the King of kings will faithfully and impassionately declare his message of life and salvation, I am sure the everlasting God will raise us up competent leaders, help us to properly solve our problems, and the Church will "look forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

L. W. MUNHALL.

The Church Must Unite to Impress Its Spiritual Influence upon the World

IT greatly interested me to read the abstracts of the speeches and your editorial comment on the Religious Congress held at Pittsburg, where the main topic was war and how Christianity stood helpless when this great catastrophe broke out in Europe. It is a humiliating plight for the Christian religion that hitherto we are a disorganized body and unable to assert our rights. We are millions common in faith to uplift humanity, but brute force with all its terrors stalks among us, cowering the lambs into submission. May this reign of terror teach a lesson to those who believe in the doctrines of Jesus Christ, that we, as churches and denominations, must not look for points on which we differ and remain divided, but let us look for points where we harmonize and on them unite. Then and only then will we become a factor of influence in the social and political world, and be better equipped to serve God and humanity. What the Church needs is system to combine her branches; like Christ, speaking, "I am the Vine, ye are the branches."

There is only one faith, one Christ, one God. With that aim in view I would advocate an International Consolidated Christian Alliance, having for its motto "The fear of God and Justice to Man." This alliance must have a platform stating its belief and aims, and an executive body to make them effective.

First the Platform: "The Bible is our rule and guide in conduct. Jesus Christ, the foundation of our Faith. Christ's command was to love God with our whole heart, body and soul, and our neighbor as ourselves."

We favor disarmament of the nations, because history has proven that heavy armament is no security for peace. Justice and righteousness without fear and favor shall be our basis on discussions. We believe in more Bible instruction for our public schools and less fairy-tales. We invite for membership all who are in sympathy with our aims to overthrow the common enemy of man.

International religious congresses should be promoted and be attended by delegates.

The above is a condensed plan; however, I have faith in it. The Christian Church is strong; all she requires is system to assert power, and her voice will be recognized in congresses, parliaments and thrones. Railroads have system, big businesses have it, the Church of Christ should have it. In union is strength, division is chaos.

Kanawha, Ia. N. H. VELDHUSE.

The Church Has What the World Most Needs—Christ, Who Alone Can Heal the World's Unrest, writes Dr. Charles C. Albertson

NEVER were there so many demands upon the Church, so many calls for service, so many challenges to enter and occupy fields which are ripe for the harvest. The deep distress of the war-torn world, the unutterable longing of millions for the dawn of peace, the far-away look in the eyes of unnumbered women and children whose dear ones are in camp or at the battle-front, the acute suffering which has already been caused among all the nations by the economic pressure that raises prices and often fails to raise salaries—all these things call emergently and immediately upon the Church to arise and put on her strength.

That the Church already has leaders who have a vision of the present possibility of manifold service in the Master's name is evident by the utterances at the recent Pittsburg Conference, and by a multitude of other expressions on every hand. All the upstanding and forward-looking men of the Church are eagerly entering every open avenue of spiritual and social service. I know a score of men, ministers and laymen, big of brain and great of heart, who have

"YOU'D better arrange to be here about six of the evening," Mr. Wunder had written. "I want you to see our Christian Endeavor. We are just a little proud of some of the things being done in the 'Hut' at Fort Thomas; but of them all we are proudest of the crowds that come out for that."

Silhouetted against the river-fog, there was outlined a big building. It looked much like the halls erected in the Mid-West for county fairs; the walls sloped up and in, and a long and rather high gable rose, to slope into a peak once more. The building was an attractive brown, almost black, relieved by broad stripes of white at windows and doors. The familiar deep-red circle and triangle of the "Y" stood forth, a beacon of welcome, while, more cheering still, through the windows there blazed a broad flood of yellow light. Soldier-forms in khaki overcoats came from everywhere near.

Inside the place was crowded with soldiers, Endeavorers gradually gathering at one end near the platform. A monster fireplace held a crackling log-fire, that filled the room with delightful warmth. We, too, stepped down toward the platform, with its little reading-stand and large motion-picture screen.

The clock struck six; and

Christian Endeavor in Army Camps

The fellow who won't loosen up when a log fire crackles in the open fireplace well, he isn't in the army we counted some fifty or more soldiers gathered for Christian Endeavor service. A soldier took charge; Y. M. C. A. officials were at hand; and the program was one of which the Christian Endeavorers of any church might be proud.

Only war, perhaps, could have brought such widely assorted types of men to this remote point in an upland valley of the Kentucky hills. Hardly two seat-mates from the same point; probably no two, when in civil life, of the same profession, or business, or trade. Here they were gathered together to go out and fight for democracy. Tomorrow they would be dispatched, some to sea, some to coast points, some to training camps to the westward, others elsewhere, but all to some place where the nation needed men.

As the program proceeded the soldiers sat on the long wooden benches to right and left of the center aisle; quiet, no different from a group of Endeavorers anywhere, only they were getting their minds off the homesickness which will attack the stoutest soldier; they were forgetting the little anxieties that will arise; they were forgetting war's grimmer side and receiving inspiration that would remain with them for years, after even the eventful days when they shall have "gone over the top."

FELIX J. KOCH.

THERE is a story told of a famous circus clown, who notwithstanding his fun-making profession became the subject of deep depression. Never had the public seen such a comical, mirth-provoking character as he. As soon, however, as his public performances were over he became morbid, morose, and melancholy. His manager advised, then insisted, that he obtain medical advice. He went to a physician, who after examining him said: "You need diversion. Read light literature. Go to the theatre. See something amusing. Enjoy a good laugh. There is a circus in town, and they say that the principal clown is irresistibly funny. Go and see him!" The man slowly raised his eyes to the doctor's face, gazed upon him in dull and almost contemptuous surprise, and replied: "Why, doctor, I am that clown!"

"Who can minister to a mind diseased?" He made others laugh, but could not laugh himself. His fun only touched in others the superficialities of life. His own deep grief betokened a soul need that could only find solace in touch and communion with God.

WE have with us in our Bowery Mission family at the present time an old man, almost an octogenarian, living a sweet, beautiful Christian life, who for over sixty years was a circus comedian, but in his old age realized a similar need, and fortunately, in answer to the prayers of a godly mother long since passed to her reward, found the solace and strength he needed in the fulfillment of Christ's gracious promise, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst."

He is always in his place on the Bowery Mission platform, ready to tell the thrilling story of his conversion. There is never time for him to refer to more than a small section of his life, but those of us who know him best have come to have a fairly completely biographical knowledge of the events that have culminated in a beautiful experience of real communion with God as his sun sets.

In our family circle gathering last Christmas, at the urgent request of many of the boys, he appeared in his old minstrel costume, and sang "Old Black Joe." It was strangely pathetic and beautiful, and it had a significance never dreamed of in the old circus and concert-hall days.

IN the late forties and early fifties, if any act of boyish mischief was discovered in the neighborhood of Grand and Hudson Streets, Albany, New York, it was generally attributed to little Georgie Anderson. Although his parents were of the ultra-respectable kind, members of the old Dutch Reformed Church and duly respected by their neighbors, little Georgie was regarded as the very embodiment of impish mischief. Was he not the ring-leader of that group of boys who made merry in the grapevines that ran on the sheds at the back of Dominic James' and Thurlow Weed's yards? And when that surreptitious stone smashed the Dominic's plate glass window, who else could it be but little Georgie?

"I Am That Clown"

A Bowery Mission Story

At any rate, the boy was blamed; there came the tragedy into the life of George Anderson that led to the long course of wandering, dissipation, and sin. He was convicted without trial by the jury of outraged neighbors, and punishment was inflicted by the strong right arm of the stern, mistaken, but well-intentioned Puritan father. That night the boy stole down to the steamboat wharf, next morning he was in New York City, a few hours later he was at the Old Bowery Theater, making terms with Mr. Levi J. North, the famous padriker, for an apprenticeship in that business; and for seventeen years he never saw his parents again.

Thus began the circus life of George Anderson. His first tour with Levi North took him over the greater portion of the globe, the troupe visiting in turn the West Indies, South America, South Africa and India, while on the return journey they covered most of the countries of Europe. In the long after years, in connection with Cooper and Bailey, Barnum and Bailey's, Sells' and Forcpangh, and other traveling circuses, he was taken to almost every corner of the known world. He played many parts. As acrobat, tumbler, leaper, padriker, mountebank, sideshowman, and singing clown, he became known in almost every town and village in the United States and Canada. In later years, when the Bowery was at its height, or depth, of fame as an amusement resort, he was a museum lecturer and proprietor.

It is needless to say that, notwithstanding his early Christian training, this kind of experience led to very rapid moral degeneration, and the old man naturally exhibits great reluctance in dwelling upon the sad, dark, terrible days of the past. His more than questionable methods, of which, even as a young man, he made big harvests of monetary gain, and the vicious, reckless and profligate modes by which he spent it, cover many pages in the book of his life, that he would like to fasten down with an iron hasp and forget forever. With tears streaming down his face he often tells us how he would love to make restitution to the many he has wronged, and how he yearns for a chance of undoing the results of his deeds upon others by his evil and self-indulgent life.

He became a drunkard—a confirmed, hopeless, despairing drunkard. The passage of the years, and his evil habits, robbed him of his charming tenor voice and his abilities as an athlete, and at last he found himself, an old man, without a home, without friends or hope.

His only refuge from the bitter memories of the past was that subtle and deceptive producer of temporary forgetfulness, alcoholic drink. And whisky sometimes, for the brief delusive moment, made him feel as though he did not care. Then, when the time of awakening came, he was more utterly despairing than ever.

One night, in Brooklyn, when he felt he had touched the very bottom of the pit of despair, he passed the Hanson Place Baptist Church, in which Evangelistic services were being conducted by the Rev. W. Wicker. It was a summer evening, the windows of the church were open, and the singing attracted him. Befuddled as he was with drink, he heard the words distinctly, and he remembered they were his mother's favorite hymn, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." He stopped and listened, transfixed, spellbound. The great truth that the hymn embodied, the eternal refuge for a poor storm-tossed soul, took possession of him. He felt it was a voice from heaven speaking to him. Without a moment's hesitation he entered the church, rushed down the aisle, and flinging himself at the altar rail he cried out: "I want to find my mother's God."

He found God, and peace, and soul-rest that night, and for three years lived a happy Christian life. But the tempter came, the weak spot was attacked, and he fell.

HERE a beautiful incident comes to view, illustrating the fact that in these modern days of church life there is many a gallant knight-errant ready to ride to the rescue of the fallen and distressed.

Deacon Perkins, of the Hanson Place Church, was passing along a Brooklyn street one day and saw Anderson enter a saloon. A strong, a mastering impulse urged the deacon to rush in and bring him out, but he hesitated. It was scarcely the place for a respectable, well-known deacon to be seen to enter. What would people say? What good could he do? Would not the delinquent himself resent it, and thus the well-intended act do more harm than good? But the welfare of a human soul was in the balance; not a moment was to be lost, so through the swinging doors the gallant deacon went. The few moments delay had enabled the old clown to order his drink, and he was just raising it to his lips when he felt a strong hand upon his shoulder and heard a kind and well-known voice saying, "George, don't!" He looked into the deacon's face, put the glass down untasted, came out with his friend, and has never since been inside a saloon.

Deacon Perkins came to the conclusion that the old man needed the comfort and strengthening influences of a Christian home, and at once brought him to the Bowery Mission.

He is one of the associate leaders of the Mission. His testimony is always thrilling and effective. He never fails to pay a tribute of heartfelt gratitude to the Christian people who rescued him from his terrible condition of helpless despair, to the Bowery Mission for having afforded him such sheltering and safeguarding care, but most of all to Him "who hath not dealt with him after his sins, nor rewarded him according to his iniquities." J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent, Bowery Mission.

NOTE.—The Bowery Mission is in great and sore need of funds. The Trustees are anxious that this fact should be known to its friends and sympathizers. Notwithstanding the great demands for war relief purposes, the splendid work of the Mission must not for one moment be imperiled or hindered by this cause. Send as soon as you can to the treasurer, Mr. Theodore Waters, Christian Herald office, New York City, a contribution to this, the greatest home mission in the world. It is great because the opportunity is great.

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS INSTALMENTS

HOWARD CHASE, a young Congregational minister, single, receives a call from a church in Red Hill, a village of seven hundred people in Kansas. After consulting with his classmate and chum, Roy Lennox, he accepts the call and leaves with his sister Rose for his new field, where he is received by Mr. Burton, a deacon of his new church, and his daughter Agnes, and taken to the parsonage, and afterward introduced to the pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches. The following Sunday he preaches his first sermon, and on Monday makes the acquaintance of Inez Clark, the movie-struck daughter of the village editor.

HOWARD walked over to the case where Clark had put the copy. But Inez had somehow anticipated him with a swift movement, and their hands touched over the bit of paper. Her face was instantly flooded with color and she stammered "Oh! excuse me."

Howard never showed by the slightest quiver any embarrassment, but he took the paper over where Clark was standing and began to write at the bottom of the page:

"Next Sunday evening, if the weather permits, services will be held outdoors. Seats for all. Those who come in automobiles can see and hear in their cars. Services will begin at eight. Good music by the chorus. The subject of the sermon will be 'The Foolish Farmer!'"

"There! How's that? That ought to bring the farmers!"

He laughed again, the almost rude laugh that had made Inez shrink back. And then immediately his eyes seemed to gather great depth and his face became stern and his whole attitude put Clark and his daughter wholly out of his thought, and they seemed to feel, as they looked at him, that he was removed from them by miles of distance, thinking over his own thoughts in a world of his own, from which he had excluded every one but himself.

"How many copies do you want?" Clark was saying after a moment of complete silence.

"How? How many? Oh, make it five hundred. And when can I get them?" He had come back into the shop from his abstraction and spoke in his regular straightforward, wide-awake manner.

"I can have them ready by tomorrow morning."

"Thank you, Mr. Clark. I'll appreciate that. Good-by."

He took off his hat as he bowed, turned and went quickly out, stopping the swing of the door in time to prevent its banging.

Clark picked up the copy and carried it over to Inez, saying, "Great fellow, isn't he? He'll make the trustees sit up. You can begin on that. See how neat a job you can do, Inez."

The girl did not answer as her father went back to his desk at the other side of the shop. From where she sat she could see the minister as he crossed the street, and she watched him as he reached the other side and started to go down the walk.

THEN a little thing happened, a small event in any human life; but as the girl watched it from where she sat it burned into her memory like something eternal, and her heart beat the sidewalk and broke. The dog at once turned its attention to the spilled milk. Chase was between the child and Inez, but his action filled in the details of the little drama, for the next moment the minister and the child disappeared into the milk depot and a minute later came out, Chase with a new bottle of milk and the child walking by his side holding his hand as if she had known him always, and the minister laughing and evidently carry-

Howard Chase had not turned the corner before he had learned the name and residence of his new acquaintance.

"Did you say Wilson?"

"Yes, sir, Lida Wilson. And I live next door to Deacon Burton."

"Miss Wilson, with your permission I will see you safe home with this milk. Are you willing?"

"Yes, sir. I know you. You are the new Congregational minister, aren't you? We are Methodists."

"I won't let that prejudice me, Miss Wilson. I think just as much of you as if you were a 'Congregationalist.'"

The child looked up at him with the deep gravity of six years of experience.

"My mother won't like it to have me break the bottle. I broke one last week."

"I'll tell her how the dog frightened you. Really we should have brought the dog along to show her. My mistake. But the milk wasn't wasted. Really, that dog was waiting for you, I believe. It was his only show to get a breakfast, and I don't believe he had a cent in his pocket."

"Mother will pay you for the bottle, Mr. — Mr. —"

"Mr. Chase is my name. I should have introduced myself before." Howard managed to shift the bottle under his arm and took off his hat.

The child laughed and tightened her hold on his hand.

"You're funny, Mr. Chase, but I like you."

Howard looked down at her (she was a very little girl) and said very gravely:

"Thank you. Little girls almost always like me. I don't know just why."

"Don't big girls like you, too?"

"Oh, dear, I'm afraid they do, Miss Wilson. But we're getting into deep conversational water. Good thing we're almost at your residence."

"There's Miss Burton. She's a big girl."

HOWARD caught sight of Deacon Burton's daughter out in the yard picking roses from a bush near the front porch. And as he came up by the yard she looked up and smiled while Howard stopped to say good morning.

"What wonderful mornings you have out here, Miss Burton! But I did not know it could be so hot in May. It's just like summer."

"Yes, it's the climate of the prairie. I hope you and your sister are going to like it." "Oh, we're in love with it already. And Red Hill is full of adventures. I've just had an exciting one with Miss Wilson here."

"Let me have the bottle, please, Mr. Chase. And I'll run in and get the money."

Miss Wilson seized the bottle, holding it very carefully in both hands, and ran into the next house adjoining the Burtons'. Howard gave Miss Burton

"I suppose not," said Miss Burton, as she picked the petals off a rose quicker and her pulses throbbed with new meaning.

The first door across the street from Clark's printing-shop was a milk depot. Just as the minister was passing this door it opened suddenly and a little girl came running out with a bottle of milk. A small dog was lying on a step in front of the door, and as the child came out it rose suddenly and barked.

The child started back and in her fright dropped the bottle. It fell on ing on a great and important conversation. Inez went to the window and watched the two figures, the stalwart athletic man and the little girl, until they turned a corner.

And then she went back to her seat at the case and sat there with burning cheeks, eyeing the copy for the minister's "dodger." But before she began work upon it she covered her face with her hands, and when she took them away they were wet with hot tears.

a humorous sketch of his morning adventure, and then told of his Sunday evening plan.

"I put down on the notice 'Good music by the chorus.' You will see to that, won't you, Miss Burton?"

"Yes. We can sing some of the old hymns like 'The Way of the Cross Leads Home,' and ask every one to join in the chorus."

She had gradually come down to the front of the yard by the walk, holding the flowers she had picked against her white dress, and Howard had a momentary troubled vision of the lilacs on the edge of the pulpit Sunday morning and was wondering—when little Miss Wilson came running out.

"Mother hadn't any change and I had to shake it out of my bank. That's why it took so long," the little maid said as she gravely put the moist pennies into Howard's hand. "And mother said to thank you."

"Excuse me, Miss Burton, I expect I ought to complete my adventure by explaining to Miss Wilson's mother how it all happened."

HE bowed as he took off his hat with a formal good-by, and Miss Burton turned to go back into the house. But on the porch she turned again to look at the new minister and Miss Wilson. Lida had hold of his hand again, and Mrs. Wilson had come to the door. The houses were close together, and Agnes Burton, lingering on the porch, could hear the neighbor say heartily:

"Thank you, Mr. Chase, for your kindness to Lida. She is a shy little girl, but you made a conquest of her right off."

Howard laughed, and very briefly told the story of the dog, the spilled milk and the crying child. He was interrupted by Lida.

"Mother, I wish we were Congregationalists, instead of Methodists. Then I could go to Mr. Chase's church."

Mrs. Wilson laughed as Howard turned to go back to the main business street.

"I'm afraid you'll break up our church if you keep on, Mr. Chase. You must come in now, Lida. Say good-by to Mr. Chase."

"Good-by and thank you," said Lida, dropping his hand reluctantly.

"Good-by, Mrs. Wilson. Happy to have met you." He included in his farewell Mrs. Wilson and Agnes Burton, who still lingered on the porch.

The Wilsons and the Burtons held frequent porch conversations, the houses were so near together and their lawns adjoining.

"Your new minister is a very attractive young man, Agnes, don't you think?"

"Yes," said Miss Burton slowly.

"You won't be able to keep him long. Such bright preachers don't stay long in small towns."

"I suppose not," said Miss Burton, as she picked the petals off a rose and let them drop on the porch floor.

"I didn't hear him last Sunday, but I think I'll go in the evening if I can get in."

MISS BURTON spoke of the minister's plan for the outdoor services, and Mrs. Wilson seemed greatly interested.

"Your minister is going to get all our folks over to his services, Agnes, if he keeps on. But he'll have to be awful careful. He's an unusually attractive and smart young man, and he isn't married. I expect all the young ladies in Red Hill are after him already."

"I don't think Mr. Chase is in any danger," Agnes spoke hastily, seemed about to add another sentence, then shut her lips resolutely and went into the house. Mrs. Wilson shook her head as if she knew more than she would tell, as Agnes disappeared.

As Howard went up the main street he stopped in to see Deacon Burton to talk over his plan for evening services.

He found the deacon a little doubtful about the plan on account of the unsettled weather.

"You see, Mr. Chase, I think the idea is fine, but you don't know this prairie country as we do who have lived on it all our lives. We have some most tremendous thunder storms here in May and June, and they generally come up out of the southwest late in the afternoon, very often at seven or eight o'clock. They are terrific, and will always be a part of a prairie country."

"You don't have cyclones here, do you? The Eastern papers were always quoting Kansas as the home of the cyclone and the blizzard."

"No!" Deacon Burton exploded. "We never did have a cyclone in Red Hill. Last year Georgia headed the list of states in the United States for the largest number of cyclones. It's a slander on Kansas to call it a cyclone state. But—we do have some great wind and thunder storms at this time of the year. I'm afraid if you start outdoor meetings they will be interrupted by storms."

"But I'm having dodgers printed announcing the meetings to begin next Sunday."

"You are!" Deacon Burton seemed disturbed, then he laughed. "Oh, go ahead. Have you spoken to any of the other church officers about it?"

"Why no, I never thought of it. I thought the church called me to work in the best way I could."

Deacon Burton exploded again.

"It's all right as far as I'm concerned. Go ahead. But I would advise you to consult with Deacon Allen before you begin stringing your electric lights. He is pretty touchy about being consulted. And, by the way, how are you going to pay for the platform, and the wiring, and the incidentals, the printing and so forth?"

"Why, I'm paying for the printing myself. And if the church won't buy the lumber and the wire, I will. I'll do all the work for nothing. Why, it's a part of my job. It's what I came out here for."

DEACON BURTON looked at the new minister a moment without a word. Then he threw up his hands and exclaimed, "You can go through me and get all I have. You've got the drop on me. But I can't answer for Deacon Allen. He will have to be shown. How much do you want for the lumber?"

"I haven't figured it out yet. I'll tell you after dinner. I'll go right over and see Deacon Allen now."

It seemed only a few minutes before Howard was back in the store, calmly saying to Deacon Burton, "It's all right with Deacon Allen. I saw him and he offered to give five dollars."

"Have you got the money?"

"No, but I'll get it. Now tell me where to get the lumber and the wire, and I'll get busy with the platform, and not trouble you any more today."

The deacon gave him the necessary information, and as Howard shot out of the store he muttered to himself, "I'd give five dollars to know what the young fellow said to Deacon Allen to get his consent. And if he can get five dollars out of him besides, well, a six-foot miracle has come to Red Hill on two feet."

THE good deacon was still puzzling over the matter when half an hour later Deacon Allen came in. Deacon Allen kept an implement store and was popularly supposed by Red Hill, which knew everybody's income, to be worth at least fifteen thousand dollars.

"Mr. Chase has just been over to see me about a plan he has for outdoor Sunday evening services. He asked me if I wouldn't come over and counsel with you about it. He said he had already spoken to you."

"Yes. I think it's a great plan if the thunder storms let it alone. And it will be extra expense."

"Yes. I thought of that, and asked him about it. He said if the church couldn't afford it he would pay for it and do the work. That didn't seem just fair, so I offered to subscribe five dollars."

"I'll give ten if you'll tell me, Deacon, how the minister got you to do it."

Deacon Allen turned red, evaded Deacon Burton's look, then he turned and faced him directly.

"I tell you, Burton, I don't know myself how he did it."

"Have you paid him the money yet?"

"No. But of course—"

"Give it to me and I'll put ten with

Miller Announces Uniform Tires

Built By Crack Squads (96% Efficient)

NOW we present the world's first Uniform Tires. Not uniform only in looks—all tires are that. What we announce is uniform mileage. And this in tires already famous for wear. Please read—

Motorists today must choose between about 429 brands of tires. Even tires made side by side, in the same factory, differ in mileage enormously.

If you get a "lucky tire" it may run between 5,000 and 10,000 miles. The next may fail under 500.

Not so with Miller Tires. Once they varied as the rest do. Today less than one per cent ever call for adjustment.

It would seem that other makers, too, could attain this uniformity. For methods are standard—known to all.

But tires are mostly handwork. They differ as the men who build them differ—and always must. Miller has triumphed by solving this human equation. By ridding these tires of "human variables."

99% Excellent

Miller tire-builders are carefully recruited. Each must meet exacting standards.

Then science keeps books on every man's personal efficiency.

He is marked on every tire that he builds.

But more than that, he is penalized if ever one comes back.

Thus we've created a body of master tire-builders—called the crack regiment of the whole tire army. Their average personal efficiency is 96 per cent.

The tires they build 99 in a hundred—wear practically uniform under like conditions. That means these tires are 99 per cent excellent.

Tens of thousands of records furnish conclusive proof.

1 Motorist in 50

Tires so uniform can never be produced where quantity output rules. Picked men are limited. And if you multiply workmen you multiply variables.

Team-work by its very nature is limited to a few.

Hence Miller Tires can never catch up with demand. And we can supply only one dealer in each neighborhood. Only about one motorist in fifty can get Millers.

Geared-to-the-Road

These are the only tires actually geared-to-the-road. Note the ratchet-like tread—how the cogs engage the ground at each turn.

That gives positive traction; it keeps the wheels from slipping. They can't spin when you start your car. Thus the Miller Tread prevents scuffing and burning tires. And of course it makes all roads safer.

Next time you buy tires go to the nearest Miller dealer. Don't buy only one—put a pair of Miller teammates on opposite wheels of your car. Then both will experience like wear.

After that proof of Miller uniformity you'll never trust to luck.

it. The young fellow ought to be encouraged. And you know, Deacon, we've got money to burn."

"Speak for yourself," said Deacon Allen a little gruffly. But he pulled out a fat pocketbook, extracted from it the dirtiest five it contained, and handed it over to Deacon Burton.

Burton chuckled as he took it. "There's so much saved from burning, anyhow."

"I'll burn in a big electric light bill all right," said Deacon Allen as he went out of the store. "But after all, I don't mind. We don't get preachers like him in Red Hill every day. He's smart, he is."

Deacon Burton grinned over the incident several times that morning, and after dinner he walked around by the church. The lumber was in the churchyard, and Howard was in his shirt-sleeves sawing and pounding away and whistling as he worked.

"I'll send one of the boys up this afternoon to help," the deacon said. "And here's Deacon Allen's subscription and mine."

He handed Howard three clean five dollar bills (he had been to the bank to get them) and Howard with a smile tucked the money into his pocket.

"I think that will about cover the entire expense. I appreciate it. And I won't forget it when I come to preach your funeral sermons."

"What did you say to Deacon Allen? I'd give another five to know."

Howard grinned.

"I haven't time to tell now. Too busy. Why don't you ask him?"

"I did, and he said he didn't know how you did it."

Howard laid down his hammer and laughed, the rude boisterous laugh that did not seem to belong to him.

"The deacon never had any fun with his money. Won't it be a good turn for him if we can make him have some before he goes to the land where nothing but character is legal tender?"

As the deacon turned to go away, he said, "Oh, I forgot. Mrs. Burton asked me to give your sister and you a special invitation to Sunday dinner."

"I believe it will be a go, Rose," Howard had said when Saturday night came and he and his sister had gone over to the church to see if anything more were needed.

He went into the little vestibule and turned on the lights. Everything was all right. Extra seats were in the Sunday school room ready to be carried out, and Howard had secured the services of a number of his boys to act as ushers. Red Hill was talking about the scheme to a household. And the farmers ten miles out were reading his dodgers and many of them planning to go to church who had not gone for years. Sunday morning dawned hot and still. The morning service was almost a repetition of the first Sunday. Not quite so many out, but a number of new faces. And Howard preached with all his might.

A meal at the Burtons' was a liberal education in the art of domestic science. Howard, who was a hearty eater, soon found out that Mrs. Burton and Agnes did all the cooking, and he did not try to conceal his pleasure, but to the evident disappointment of the Burtons excused himself immediately after the meal in order to complete his plans for the evening.

The deacon stepped out on the porch as Howard left the house and walked to the end looking out to the southwest.

A gray line was spreading over the sky, clearly defined against the blue.

"Don't want to discourage you, Chase. But if I know anything about prairie weather, we are in for a big storm some time this afternoon."

Howard went over to the church, and finding it cooler there than in his little study at the parsonage he stayed there working on his evening sermon, going over his points again and again, now and then walking up and down the aisle and speaking aloud.

He was absorbed in his task so deeply that he came to himself with a start at the sound of a peal of thunder that rolled over the church and into the open windows like a solid thing.

He ran out on the platform. The gray line that Deacon Burton had noticed had swept over the sky and covered the sun, and back under the line was a great green-black cloud covering all the southwest heaven.

He took out his watch. It was half-past four. He went back into the church and closed the windows. As he started across the churchyard to the parsonage a patter of hailstones fell around him, and before he had reached the little porch big drops of rain spattered over the grass. A warm air touched his cheek, and out back of the houses in the next blocks the trees suddenly bent over and a dull roar came to his ear like the beat of the surf on the old Maine coast where he was born. And for the first time in his life as he ran upstairs to shut the windows the young minister at Red Hill felt a clutch of something like fear at his heart as the prairie thunder storm in all its fury came bounding in from its wide prairie stretches and fell with wild roar over parsonage and church, blotting out the sunlight and crashing with all its elemental power over the crouching and terrified town.

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

IT is well to have a time for prayer, whether it be morning, noon or night, or all three. Some make a practice of entering into a spirit of prayer whenever the day's work brings them a moment of quietness. In that, too, there is strength. But in addition to having these regular times for prayer it is well to remember that every time of spiritual crisis is a time for prayer. If we are tempted at ten o'clock we need not wait until the bells have chimed for noon before we pray for help to meet the temptation. If we have prayed at noon and our prayer-found strength is tested at two o'clock, we need not wait until vespers to send for reinforcements, for the Father ever waits to hear the petitions of those who are his, and Jesus has promised to be with us always, and the hand reached out in prayer to the ever-present Saviour is a sure defense against any assault of evil or unworthiness.

Mrs. B. A. G., who sends a thank-offering of $1 to be used in the Lord's work, testifies to answered prayer in the restoration of a young lady who was attacked by smallpox. She also asks bodily healing and spiritual comfort for a dear friend.

Mrs. J. G., who last spring requested prayer for her son, testifies that he was happily converted a few weeks after her request reached the Prayer League. She now prays that this son may be helped in his financial troubles so that he may keep his children in school and pay his debts.

Mrs. E. C. P. testifies to answered prayer in the healing of her grandson, to whom the physicians had promised but one chance in a thousand; also in the recovery of a dear friend, who had suffered for over two years from a serious ailment, but was healed without an operation which skilled physicians had told her was her only hope.

S. H. N. praises God for bodily healing in answer to prayer forty-one years ago, when she was given up by physicians. She is now seventy-four and praises God for all his blessings.

Mrs. Agnes T. H., Middleboro, Mass., prays for the return of her daughter, Ruth, who she thinks may be in New York.

A. W. C., a believer in prayer, sends us a plea for a "Universal Prayer League."

F. R. asks the prayers of the League that he may be divinely guided in grievous business troubles.

M. L. is in deep distress, fearing he has committed the unpardonable sin, and he asks the League to pray for him. Let us pray that the cloud may be lifted, and that he may see that as long as he cares, it is certain that his sins are not past pardon. Only he who refuses to be saved has committed this sin. Jesus saves to the uttermost; and the only power that can withstand him is the soul that does not care.

N. W. A. writes from a United States warship that his Bible class meets every night in a compartment of the ship, and that the chaplain, "one of the best in the service," preaches them a sermon every Sunday. "We are on the King's business for the souls of men," says N. W. A. "It was only last night that four young men confessed that Jesus was their personal Saviour." The prayers of the League will go out for these Christian boys who are prepared to lay down their lives if need be for the sacred cause of liberty and justice.

A missionary wrote in January asking the prayers of the League. Now she writes, "God has answered in a truly miraculous manner. . . . Praise him forever and ever!"

E. B. C. writes that a minister's wife who had already undergone several operations for cancer, and for whom she had requested prayers, has wonderfully improved.

Mrs. H. C. S. praises God for the conversion in answer to prayer of a young physician who was a victim of drink, but who now is about to enter the ministry. She asks prayers that the brother of this young man may be converted and healed of bodily infirmities; also for bodily healing for her son.

D. B. promised God that he would acknowledge an answer to prayer for the recovery of his brother from pneumonia. Mrs. M. N. T. asks prayer for aid in a case of threatened blindness.

W. J. Y. sends a beautiful prayer which breathes what we trust is the united aspiration of the Prayer League.

A. B. I. asks prayer to be delivered from her enemies.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Montverde, Fla.; Orrs Island, Me.; Culver, Ind.; Westboro, Canada; Perris, Calif.; Marion, N. C.; Keefeton, Okla.; Lando, S. C.; Sharon, Ohio; East Ryegate, Vt.; Kendrick, Idaho; Bethel, Ohio; Holden, W. Va.; Melrose, Wis.; Colwell, Iowa; Hooker, Okla.; Marysville, Kan. (that many may be saved during revival); Timpson, Texas (that many souls may be saved during meetings); Louisville, Ky. (that many may be saved during revival); Lexington, Ohio (for awakening in the church and the salvation of souls); A Soldier Boy's Mother (that God may pour out his Spirit upon the men in the trenches and training camps).

Mrs. B. M. P., Milwaukee, Wis. (that husband may be called to a church as its pastor); Mrs. J. R. S., Hooker, Okla. (that a Spirit-filled minister may be sent); Mrs. C. C. Z., Charles City, Iowa (that church troubles may be removed).

E. J. H., Mount Pleasant, Mich., asks prayer that husband may be able to preach again, that he may get into mission work.

A. M. H. asks prayer that mother's mind may be restored; Mrs. L. K., that sister's mind may be restored; M. C., that brother's mind may be restored; Mrs. L. A., that mind may be restored; Mrs. T. W. S., that a friend's mind may be restored. J. E. S. asks prayer that wife's mind may be restored; A Reader, and M. E. M., that their daughters' minds may be restored; ten friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

Five parents ask prayer for the safe return of sons after the war; M. H., that nephew may be blessed and return safely home after the war; Mrs. W. R. H., for boy in camp.

Two wives ask prayer that their husbands may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. H. C. B., that son and brother may be cured of the liquor habit; two parents, that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; four sisters, that brothers may be delivered from the liquor habit; M. S. W., that nephew may be cured of the liquor habit.

G. D. C. asks prayer that son's sight may be restored; Mrs. G., that mother's sight may be restored; Mrs. A. W., that cataracts may be removed and sight restored; G. T., that eye may be restored to its natural color; nine friends, that sight may be restored for themselves, relatives or friends. K. J. asks prayer that husband's sight may be restored; Mrs. B. M. P., that son's eye may be healed; six friends, for restoration of own sight; M. E. H., that a friend's sight may be restored.

L. A. D. asks prayer that brother may be cured of the tobacco habit; Mrs. A. F. K., that father may be cured of the tobacco habit, and brother of the cigarette habit. Mrs. S. G. and Mrs. J. H. H. ask prayer that sons may be cured of the tobacco habit.

Twelve friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing.

Twelve friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

Fifty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. A. L. H. asks prayer that husband may be cured of the drug habit.

One hundred twenty-one friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives.

Thirty-three parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; eight wives, their husbands; seventy-one, other relatives and friends.

Fifty-six friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Sixty friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

L. A. M., Prophetstown, Ill.; Mrs. L. A. V., Sparrowbush, N. Y.; Mrs. S. G., Linnens, Mo.; A Praying Mother, Galesburg, Ill.; A Member, Salineville, Ohio; Miss S. A. M., Mount Sterling, Ky.; M. N. "Company" hands

—how to have them every day

"DON'T envy my hands. Envy my good sense," said this woman, as she measured out "just enough" Gold Dust into her dishpan. "Company hands can't be put on at a moment's notice, you know. They have to 'grow'.

"In the first place, I like the water soapy and 'grease-dissolving' for the dishes. That's why I use Gold Dust. In the second place, I like it 'soft' for my hands. That's why I use 'just enough' Gold Dust—a tablespoonful to the dishpanful of water.

"I always measure it out. I don't just throw it in. It's foolish to use more than enough when 'just enough' agrees so well with dishes—and hands.

"Oh, yes, I use Gold Dust for other things, too. But I like it particularly for dishwashing, because dishwashing means putting your hands in water three times a day. And Gold Dust lessens the time you must keep your hands in water, because it so quickly dissolves the grease.

"Reasonable care and 'just enough' Gold Dust are the only secrets I know for keeping 'company' hands—right on through three-times-a-day dishwashing. But for Gold Dust results be sure it is Gold Dust you get."

Mother: Keep a jar of Musterole handy

Goodness gracious! Everybody's coughing and how are we going to move that old congestion 'way inside? "A good old-fashioned mustard plaster" says somebody. Fine—if only it would not blister!

How about Musterole? The very thing! Give us that pure white ointment. Rub it in over the place. It won't blister. And can't you just feel how it gets down underneath the skin and penetrates?

Musterole is made of oil of mustard and other home simples. Just rub it on the skin. It goes down to the seat of the congestion. There it generates heat. But it is a peculiar non-blistering heat. That heat disperses the congestion.

But the most peculiar part of Musterole is that a few moments after you have applied it you feel nothing but a delightful sense of coolness. And relief is usually immediate.

Congestion and coughing usually go when that clean, pure, white ointment searches them out.

Musterole comes in 30c and 60c jars—hospital size $2.50 at all druggists. The Musterole Co., Cleveland, Ohio

Jesus At Work

International Sunday School Lesson for January 20.

Mark 1:21-45.

A Busy Sabbath Day in Galilee

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THOUGH we have not completed the first chapter of the Gospel of Mark, we already find Jesus, the Mighty Worker, in the midst of his arduous toil. What a contrast between the lonely scene of the temptation in the wilderness when he planned his work, and this busy, teeming city of Capernaum with its many crying human needs! If Christ had not been sure of his perspective he might have been thrown out of his true line of endeavor. Yet we find him steady, undismayed, turning his powerful personality to task upon task, always with human blessing in mind, always returning to his supreme mission.

The first of Mark's snapshots of the Master at Work portrays him eagerly making his way to the synagogue, "straightway on the Sabbath day," and there teaching the people. We know now that Jesus was a wonderful teacher, and as we study modern pedagogy we find that he anticipated in practice the finest developments of our theories. First of all he was interesting. Common people heard him gladly. It is terrible for a teacher to be dull. It is almost criminal for a teacher of religion to be uninteresting, repelling youthful minds from the fields of truth. Jesus fascinated even his critics. Then he was simple, though grappling with the deepest issues of God and the soul. His interest and his simplicity were largely due to his pictorial method of setting forth truth, which has given us in the parables a marvelous series of illustrations from common life. The best teachers are those who have or who acquire this knack of illustration. And we learn from Jesus the tactful use of the Socratic method, of wisely put questions to lead our pupils to find the truth for themselves under our guidance.

All these are found in Jesus' great lesson on Neighborliness in the tenth of Luke. If he had answered the lawyer's question by saying "Even a Samaritan is your neighbor," further argument would have resulted. Instead he told an interesting story, remarkably simple and compelling, and then secured the truth from his questioner.

Jesus the Sympathetic

The second of our little series of lesson pictures portrays Jesus in the richness of his sympathy, which dominates the rest of the chapter. He was interrupted in his teaching by an insane epileptic, who cried out in the synagogue. Most rabbis would have had him thrown out. But Jesus goes out to him in firmness mingled with great tenderness, and renders real help to him by the power of his own wondrous spirit.

I like to think of the unfortunate man, calmed in mind, but doubtless still different from those never afflicted, following after Jesus Christ in childlike, eager love. I have known similar sufferers who were fond of the church and Sunday school, where they were sure of kindness and sympathy, and free from the scorn of the thoughtless.

We can all be like David Grayson, and follow the open road on the lookout for "Adventures in Friendship." The rich and the poor, the wise and the foolish, the weak and the strong, all call for the sympathy and compassion of our Saviour. Inasmuch as we do it unto one of these least, we do it unto him.

Jesus the Helper of the Suffering

Now we are launched upon Mark's account of how Jesus ministered to human needs, going about doing good. First, the familiar well-loved figure responding to the anxious call of his closest friends, going into the upper room where sudden fever had stricken down the mother. How soon that cooling touch had worked its miracle and how quickly that loved one insisted upon resuming her appointed task! Then that glorious sunset picture of the Helper of Men going in and out among the throng. How lovely are the words of the Evangel: "At even, when the sun was set, they brought unto him all that were sick and that were possessed." What a multitude the afflicted of the earth still are!

How wonderfully the spirit of Christ is found in modern ministries to human need! Then not a hospital, not an asylum, not a refuge; now all of these, most of them earnestly served and truly Christian. Then ignorant malpractice and magic, now the wonders of anesthesia and antitoxins. Then epidemics of horror, now constructive and alternative treatment of every case. The doctor and the nurse are doing tasks which Jesus Christ sanctified in his own person. Theirs is a truly Christlike ministry, to which some of our boys and girls are as surely called as any man is to preach. Set forth the call in class and home, that some may respond. "Send me."

The Red Cross of Ministry

By millions our Christian people have been enrolling in the American Red Cross, whose symbol has become a beacon of hope in peace and in war. Do not fail to teach the need of the American Red Cross to meet so efficiently the catastrophes at home and abroad even in times of prosperity and quiet. Now that the hideous scourge of war, with human suffering multiplied by every engine of destruction that the human mind can contrive, is spread world-wide, let us be glad that some ameliorative agency is at work, and let us give and give, and go and work, that in His name many precious lives may be saved to their dear ones at home. Each man reclaimed and nursed back to health means a family kept together, a home filled with hope again.

Jesus and His Supreme Mission

After that wonderful evening of ministry to human pain, Jesus seems somewhat perturbed. At least he arises early and spends much time in prayer. Evidently he came to a definite answer to his petition of the Father, for when Peter came to tell him of the waiting crowds with their sick he refused to return, saying, "Let us go elsewhere into the next town." Why did Jesus press on, leaving so much suffering still?

In a sense he seems to have been hampered by the natural clamors of the ailing. He was actually embarrassed by the thirst for miracles! For his supreme mission, after all, was spiritual, to the souls of men. He could not possibly heal all the sick, comfort all the mourning. But he could and he must deliver the message that at last would transform all human life and result in world-wide ministries, multiplied by the many.

So he hastened on. "I must preach," he says to the surprised Peter, "I must preach the good tidings of the Kingdom of God to other cities also; for to that end was I sent."

Yet he never could refuse a personal appeal for help. Nothing was so important that it could not wait while he spoke to a troubled soul. He could come down from the Mount of Transfiguration to treat an epileptic boy. But he would not be turned aside from his chief enterprise, namely, to build on earth the Kingdom of his Father. I do not think he would approve an interpretation of his teachings that would put the central emphasis on healing the sick, and forget to go out into all the world and preach the Gospel.

The medical missionary should not cease to be a missionary, the doctor and the nurse to be Christians. After all there is something worse than even human pain, and that is sin. That man who loveth darkness rather than light because his deeds are evil is in worse case than the poor leper in the hill-country of Galilee. But the power of God can take even such an one and make him clean and send him forth to minister in the spirit of the Christ.

Some Teachers Whom I Remember

WHAT are the things that we remember about our teachers after the years have gone? I venture to say that hardly a word of what was taught is specially remembered in connection with any teacher. Now and then some story that was told may stick. After all, the big thing about our teachers is what they were in their spirit, the atmosphere of their lives, and what they did for us.

As I think back over the years, one or two things of this sort are remembered. Perhaps a suggestion of these will show the things that make long memories in a boy's life.

The first teacher I recall called on me when I was sick and brought a bag of peanuts. Strange that I have forgotten everything but those peanuts!

My next teacher, a Mr. McCall, was sick, very sick. I called on him because I loved him. I can remember how glad he was to see me. As I went out he told the assistant to give me some candy. Shortly after he died. I can tell you now the hymn they sung at his funeral:

"Think not of a brother deceased;
Our loss is his infinite gain;
A soul out of prison released."

and then something that rhymes with gain.

My next was saintly Mrs. Skiff. I was about eleven or twelve. She had a face of rare beauty and winsomeness. I can hear now the way she used to say "Frank." And she sent me a book once when I was away in the country, and letters which touched my heart. Dear Mother Skiff! Her two boys, when we grew up, were members of the baseball nine of which I was captain. When one of them died I was asked, as a layman, to conduct his service.

Then there was John Hanna. Our class was called "Little Drops of Water," and they were lively drops.

Bryan Says "Three Years"

THAT the nation will have voted itself dry in three years, twenty-seven states being already dry by vote of their legislatures and only nine being needed to carry the constitutional amendment, is the confident prediction of William Jennings Bryan, who may be called the most distinguished Democrat, and one of the most distinguished citizens, in private life in our country today. In a recent issue of the New York American he points out the various reasons why the American people cannot afford further to tolerate the traffic in this poison. Alcohol impairs the efficiency and productive value of the individual, making him a non-producer, whom the community cannot afford to carry. The only remedy for this state of affairs is to abolish the saloon, which not only saps the efficiency of the citizen, but is a breeding center of crime and immorality. "Why," Mr. Bryan asks, "do we appropriate money to exterminate cholera among hogs, and then license men to propagate delirium tremens among human beings? Why do we auction off the privilege of making paupers and criminals and insane, and then spend millions in an effort to care for the delinquents that graduate from the saloons?"

The liquor dealers are almost the only business men in our nation who persistently evade the laws which are made necessary by the entrance of the United States into the war for the preservation of liberty.

"There is another economic argument whose increasing weight is being daily more and more recognized, viz., that we cannot spare the foodstuffs that have heretofore been converted into alcoholic liquors. We have already taken one step toward conservation; we have prohibited the conversion of foodstuffs into alcohol during the war. But this saves only one-third of the waste. The brewers have been using about twice as much of our foodstuffs in the making of beer as the distillers use in the making of whisky. Why not save three-thirds, instead of one-third? It would strengthen our appeal to the housewives if we could show that we were saving on a large scale by denying to the brewers the bread needed for the table. To urge an increase in garden space while we turn over to the brewers the product of broad and fertile prairies looks like 'saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung-hole.'

"Prohibition ought to triumph on economic grounds alone. It ought to triumph even more surely on moral grounds; it cannot fail to triumph now, since it is also demanded by patriotism and by the spirit of democracy."

Would You Like to Talk Over Each Week's Sunday School Lesson with Dr. Scofield?

That is to ask him what each lesson teaches as to Prophecy?

The Sunday School Times will make this possible for you in 1918.

Dr. C. I. Scofield, formerly D. L. Moody's pastor at East Northfield, Mass., is the veteran Bible teacher of America, Editor of the famous Scofield Reference Bible (of the Oxford University Press), which is used and loved the world around, and author of such works as "Rightly Dividing the Word of Truth," "The New Life in Christ Jesus," and "The Scofield Bible Correspondence Course." He is perhaps the most widely known and respected Bible scholar in the English-speaking world in the field of sane, Scriptural prophecy and the truth of our Lord's Return.

Beginning with the first lesson of the new year, when in the Improved Uniform Lessons six months will be devoted to the study of the Gospel of Mark (and every syllable of that Gospel will be covered in the lessons), Dr. Scofield is writing regularly in The Sunday School Times (and in this paper only) on

The Prophecy in This Lesson

It will be a very brief article, of a few hundred words only, giving in the simplest, most direct way the ripe results of this great Bible teacher's lifetime study of God's prophetic Scriptures.

Never before in the history of the world was there such need as there is to-day,—in this black hour of almost universal war, world turmoil and chaos, kingdoms fallen and tottering, civilization threatened and baffled,—for a clear, quiet search of the Word of God for His own light upon this age and the "blessed hope" of His Son's return as rightful King to His earth.

But believers need be in no doubt or fear as to the outcome, and as to the event in the meantime. For "we have the word of prophecy made more sure" whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawn. . . . For no prophecy ever came by the will of man: but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit" (2 Pet. 1:19-21).

Dr. Scofield will help you to study this wonderful, God-given, infallible "word of prophecy" for yourself, by means of his week by week comment in

Camouflage

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I'M in the Camouflage Division," the rather new soldier told me proudly. "Camouflage?" I repeated it after him in a questioning way. "Camouflage?" (That, of course, was before the word became nation-known and popular.)

"Yes, camouflage," the rather new soldier told me. "Most of the fellows in it are artists, and we have an awfully interesting time."

"What," I asked, "do you do?"

"Why," the rather new soldier told me, "we disguise things to—fool the enemy. For instance, we paint canvas cows and nail them on wood frames, and when they are placed in the field in front of a trench, anybody looking across the field would think that it was nothing but a peaceful bit of pasture. We paint the sides of ships, too, with long, quivering lines so that they will look like waves, and sometimes with great spots of vivid color so that, at a distance, they will be too indefinite for a submarine to shoot at. That's camouflage!"

"Then," I said, "isn't a new idea, is it? How about the siege of Troy when they brought spies into a city concealed in a wooden horse? That was camouflage! How about the time, in 'Macbeth,' when an army of men marched on a castle holding boughs before them so that they looked like a moving grove of trees? That was camouflage, too."

"Of course it was," agreed the rather new soldier, "you're right—camouflage isn't a new idea. It's only the old idea of deception made into a fine art!"

I CAN remember, ever so clearly, the first time camouflage was practiced on me. A tiny little girl I was, with a bad cold, and a decided aversion to the bitter quinine pills that would cure it. My family, the pill bottle passing from one to another of them, tried promises, bribery and threats, but I stood a stubborn, sneezing little figure, with my teeth tightly clasped together.

It was our cook, who was smiling and Irish—our cook who loved me—who solved the problem. She disappeared kitchenward with the pill bottle in hand, and appeared a few minutes later with a spoonful of jam—strawberry jam.

"Shure, darlin'," she crooned in her soothing voice, "shure, see what Maggie has for her baby!"

The tear-drops dried quite miraculously on my cheeks; I smiled and opened my mouth to receive the spoon with its coveted freight. And I swallowed the jam joyfully, never dreaming that the hated pill was nestling beneath an especially large strawberry. The next day the cold was better.

I HEARD two girls talking yesterday about their respective Sunday school classes.

"I can't make the children behave at all," said one of the girls. "They laugh right out loud during service and they fidget and throw crumpled paper at each other. I'm worn out every Sunday, after teaching them, and no matter how I scold, they won't stop."

The other was a jolly-looking girl, with an errant dimple that had a habit of flickering in her soft cheek.

"I don't have any trouble at all with the children in my class," she said, "and I never have to scold them either?"

"How"—the first girl was frankly incredulous—"how do you ever manage?"

"I discovered," said the girl with the dimple, "that the boys in my class very much admired one of the young men of our church. They admired him because he was the best player on the baseball team, and he used to go to school with me, and they knew it!"

"Soon after I took the class I noticed that the children were high-tempered and given to joking and laughing. I didn't say anything, however, when they made a disturbance, but waited until I could steer the conversation around to a different channel. It wasn't hard to bring up a subject that they were interested in—the subject of the young man they liked so much."

"He's some ball player!" one of the boys volunteered.

"He certainly is!" I answered; and then after a pause I added, "I'm glad that we're such good friends. Why, we used to go to school together, and we were in the same Sunday school class."

"The boys looked interested. They stopped fidgeting. Finally one of them spoke. 'Did he go to Sunday school?' he asked."

"Indeed he did!" I answered. "They used to say (and it was quite true) that he was the best boy in the class!"

"After that I had very little trouble with the children. Small boys and girls are given to hero-worship, and the young man was their model in everything. When they discovered that he had been good in Sunday school, they, too, wanted to be good in Sunday school."

That, I think, was camouflage, too.

DECEPTION is very often not pleasant—but the art of deception, when it is trimmed up by the camouflage system, is sometimes a worthwhile art. Some folks call it tact!

One should—one must—always be truthful; but I have known people who were truthful in an unnecessarily brutal way. I have known people who thought it their duty to be needlessly harsh with their truth. They should realize that a pill covered with jam to disguise its bitterness will be just as effective—and much easier to swallow.

HAVE you ever seen a snowstorm falling over the slums of a city? I have. It creeps down softly over dirt and squalor and disease with a white covering that is like a benediction. It covers pitiful poverty with a mantle of beauty, and it transforms tumbledown tenements into princely palaces.

More camouflage.

And yet one seeing the snow is not sorry that it hides the ugliness underneath, even while he knows that the loveliness is only on the surface; and one wonders if Nature—with the eyes and hands of an artist—has not done the bit of camouflaging because she wanted to hide the unattractive sight.

Do not allow yourselves, friends of mine, to be deceitful! But when you find that you have something unpleasantly necessary to say or do, try—camouflage.

necessary for me to do so. This is a war of resources no less than of men, perhaps even more than of men, and it is necessary for the complete mobilization of our resources that the transportation systems of the country should be organized and employed under a single authority.

The committee of railroad executives who have been cooperating with the government in this all-important matter have done the utmost that it was possible for them to do; have done it with patriotic zeal and with great ability; but there were differences that they could neither escape nor neutralize.

The public interest must be first served and, in addition, the financial interests of the government and the financial interests of the railways must be brought under a common direction.

Investors in railway securities may rest assured that their rights and interests will be as scrupulously looked after by the government as they could be by the directors of the several railway systems.

The government of the United States is the only great government now engaged in the war which has not already assumed control of this sort. It was thought to be in the spirit of American institutions to attempt to do everything that was necessary through private management, and if zeal and ability and patriotic motive could have accomplished the necessary unification of administration it would certainly have been accomplished; but no zeal or ability could overcome insuperable obstacles, and I have deemed it my duty to recognize that fact in all candor now that it is demonstrated and to use without reserve the great authority reposed in me. A great national necessity dictated the action and I was therefore not at liberty to abstain from it.

The President's suggestion that the compensation to the railroads is to be figured on a basis of the average net income for the three years preceding June 30 was viewed with considerable favor by many prominent railroad executives, and it was expected that the President would go before Congress after the holiday recess with a request for action making legal some such arrangement. The average for these years as given by the Interstate Commerce Commission reports is $947,267,472, or in round numbers the government will have to guarantee about a billion dollars in net income, although the operation of the roads will produce nearly this sum, leaving perhaps $100,000,000 to be made up from the Treasury. The proposal to maintain the railroads at present efficiency as to roadbed and equipments will involve other expenditures to the extent of about another billion dollars each year. This being the estimate carefully made by railway executives of the amount which the railways would need to secure during the next year for locomotives, cars, extensions, and other betterments practically necessary if increased traffic is to be handled promptly. The total mileage taken over by the government to be operated after midnight of December 31 for government account is in the neighborhood of 250,000 miles.

During the last year there has been an increase in annual freight traffic of about 14 per cent., and in the first six months of 1917 the railroads of the nation handled as much freight as in the whole year of 1906. Government control practically amounts to a pooling of all the railway investments and equipments of the country, making it possible to use every piece of equipment and every man where vitally needed and regardless of private ownership.

Under the President's proclamation Secretary McAdoo, as Director-in-Chief of all the railways of the nation, will have authority superior to the Commerce Commissions of the nation and the states, and will be able to eliminate all causes which may hamper the necessary use of the railway facilities in the interest of the nation. The actual direction of the railways will remain in the hands of the present railway executives. Director-General McAdoo, on December 28, made the Railway's War Board an official organization and held a long conference with the board, asking it for suggestions as to ways and means. Mr. McAdoo's first order issued at noon on the 28th provided for the mutual use of trackage and for the routing of all freight by the shortest line.

The railways will now be operated with the sole thought of commanding the greatest possible power to the nation. It is one great business unified for the achievement of victory in the war.

A Verse for Each Day

M. E. MUNSON, 77 Bible House, New York City, has published a splendid little booklet which contains a calendar for 1918 and a well-chosen verse for every day in the year. This booklet will be of service not only to individuals, but to all church societies and clubs.

Miss Munson herself took a large number of these little booklets to one of the great military training camps not far from the city. The soldiers were delighted to receive them and clamored for more. "There are six fellows in my tent," one of them said, "can I take one of these for each of them?" And another boy asked, rather bashfully, "Do you s'pose this will keep me from swearin'?"

The little booklets are very worth while. And they may be purchased for the very small sum of five cents each, or $3.50 a hundred.

WHICH ROAD

Typifies the main highways in your community? This is a question that is fraught with the most serious consequences to your farmers, your manufacturers, your wage earners —you.

It may mean that farm produce can or can not be shipped to market in bad weather. It may mean that railroad embargoes will or will not shut down factories which might use motor trucks to haul fuel and raw material from a distance. It may mean that wage earners will or will not be thrown out of employment.

Freight congestion and railroad embargoes threaten the very life of any community which can not handle its short haul traffic by motor trucks. These absolutely require hard permanent roads, passable in all kinds of weather.

The Concrete Road meets all requirements.

Is your community building or getting ready to extend its system of permanent highways?

laid aside their vocations and are giving themselves uncalculatingly to the work of the Kingdom of God. If any such man should ask me, "Where is my work?" I should reply, "In the military camp or cantonment nearest you; or in the nearest Y. M. C. A. whose staff of officers is depleted by the call to military service; in the nearest Red Cross station in which helpers are needed to increase the membership and to make more effective the organization; in your own church, at the hours of worship, prayer, praise and Bible study." If any man or woman should say to me, "But what can I do for the Church and for the world in this great crisis—I who am weak and limited in influence, and chained to my daily tasks?" I should reply, "They render the highest possible service to humanity and to humanity's Lord who wait on the Lord daily and hourly, renewing their strength, and interceding for those whose activities are all too prone to crowd out their opportunities for prayer and fellowship with God."

To be made perfectly efficient, the Christian Church must first of all be, Christian; that is to say, it must keep the Master in the midst. Then it must be democratized, socialized, unified. Preaching must be simplified and intensified. There must be a passion for personal work, shared by all who profess and call themselves Christians.

A friend of mine addressed the soldiers at one of our Eastern camps a little while ago. Then, following his address, he went from tent to tent, hour after hour, conversing with the soldiers. Meal-time came, and he stayed and ate at the common soldiers' mess. When he left that camp he took the hearts of a host of boys with him. The secretary who has charge of such appointments tells me this is the kind of work that bears the richest fruit. We must not lose the art of personal evangelism. And the pulpit must sound and keep on sounding the clear note of a supernatural and present Christ able to heal the world's unrest and to reconcile the discordant nations. The Church has what the world most needs. The great problem and task is for us to establish the largest possible number of points of contact between the Church and the world.

CHARLES CARROLL ALBERTSON,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Church Must Drop Its Man-Made Religion and Proclaim Christ as Prophet, Priest, Saviour and King, writes Professor Dau

THE present war will undoubtedly bring about changed conditions in the world, to which the Church will have to adapt itself. I am fain to believe that one lesson which the entire world has learnt from this war will be, that the starting of wars can not be left to individuals or groups of individuals, rulers, diplomats or military cliques. If there are to be any more wars, the people who are directly concerned should be the only authority to decide that question by plebiscite. All righteous governments will be more than glad to be relieved of the terrible responsibility which they must assume when they declare war. All who are not righteous should not have that power. Moreover, future wars cannot be left to the decision of two or more nations who have a grievance against each other, or think they have. The present war has shown that a war between some nations seriously affects other nations. A way must be made for these other nations to be heard on the question whether there shall be war. They have a just right to be heard.

What can the Church do to exert an influence on nations and their governments? The Church cannot go into the governing business. If it wanted to do this, it should not be permitted. A Church clothed with secular power is not only a religious anomaly but a political danger. "The supreme business of the Church," said Dr. Speer at Pittsburgh, "is to recover and to mediate to men the risen and living Christ." These words were among the most thoughtful utterances spoken at the Religious Congress. "We need a clear and unflinching conviction as to the world's supreme need of him and his supreme adequacy to the world," the speaker continued.

Dr. Haldeman, in a recent issue of the Sunday School Times, pleads with the Church to abandon a false view of its business in this world and to recognize its true business. He combats the view that the Church is a sort of moral reform school and a society for ethical culture. Where this view prevails there will be a persistent striving on the part of the Church to make itself politically useful, or to fritter away its real strength in social service. The Church will seek the support particularly of powerful governments and become, in a more or less pronounced way, an agent of governments. This is degrading the Church.

The Church is being transformed into an agency for the propagation of civic righteousness and good manners. It puts forth a mighty effort to make this world better for natural man to live in, and to adapt itself to the views of natural man, in order that natural man may find it pleasant to live in the Church also. It seeks to establish man's righteousness before God, not on the Rock of Ages, the cross of Christ, but on the natural and unrenewed conscience of man. It claims to develop men; it does not renew, regenerate, recreate them. Man is represented as possessing a natural, inborn right to regard himself as the child of God. Fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion are openly rejected by prominent teachers in the Church. A Christianity is proclaimed that might as well drop the name of Christ; it could just as effectually be spread in the name of Buddha.

This is, indeed, not a pleasant picture to behold, but it is necessary that all Christians who wish to aid the Church in her true mission among men study it. The Church can succeed only with the Christ of the Scriptures, who is Priest, Prophet, and King, and whose Word begets loving obedience and energizes men fully for every service. Submission to this Word alone can remove the divisions within the Church and produce genuine church comity.

St. Louis, Mo. W. H. T. DAU.

The Church Must Reconcile Its Differences and Unite, to Receive a Blessing

I BELIEVE those gathered at the Religious Congress did right in admitting that the Church, through lack of organization and unity of purpose, had failed to do its duty. I believe there are too many church organizations, so-called, and too many professing and not enough possessing Christians. The organized denominations have not fully understood the Word of God as revealed in the Bible. We have not lived up to the light of its precious teachings. We need to humble ourselves before Almighty God, and ask his forgiveness, that we may be filled with his Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Love.

There is only one Church upon earth. The Church includes all faithful, consecrated believers, "called to be saints" (Rom. 1:7), "called unto the fellowship of his Son" (1 Cor. 1:9), "We being many are one body in Christ" (Rom. 12:5), "We are members of his body" (Eph. 5:30), "The Church which is his body" (Eph. 1:22, 23). There is only to be one Bride (the Church) and one Bridegroom, (Christ). There never should have been so many churches with their different creeds, books of discipline, etc. We must do away with our narrow, selfish creeds, and let the Word of God have free course. By doing so we shall have a blessing, and God will be glorified.

The masses of the world are crying for the bread of life from heaven today. In many cases they have been given a stone. May God forgive us and fill us with his Holy Spirit (love) in place of the spirit of the devil. ALFRED BROAD,
Coal City, Ill.

A Week in the World's News

not, however, stated, and no reports have come through of any active fighting on the part of American troops in France. A very welcome action was involved in the distribution of 350,000 Christmas packages to the boys "Over There." Thoughtful Uncle Sam supplied remembrances to those soldiers who seemed to have been forgotten by the folks at home, and supplied as well a real old-fashioned Christmas feast for every man in the service at home or abroad.

THE INCOME TAX. It was announced on December 23 that there would probably be no attempt to revise the Revenue Bill passed by the last Congress until after a six months' trial of the measure. Internal revenue officers are preparing therefore to advise citizens as to their liability under the act. Forms for the income tax return for the calendar year of 1917 are obtainable at any internal revenue office and at all post-offices. Any single person with an income in excess of $1,000 annually is liable to this tax. Married persons may acknowledge an income of $2,000 free of tax. The penalty for failing to make a return is a fine of not less than $20 and the addition of 50 per cent. to the amount of the tax due. Every person, therefore, who is in the least doubt as to his liability will find it a part of wisdom to secure a blank and make his return to the proper officer of the government. Returns must be made on or before March 1, 1918. The tax must be paid on or before June 15, 1918.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Council of National Defense announced on December 24 that good progress was being made in the preparation of 10,000 pilots and 22,000 airplanes for the battle in the air scheduled to come off some time next spring. . . . Premier Borden of Canada, on December 22, announced that, after December 24 the importation of intoxicating liquors into Canada would be prohibited, and that following investigation and a full consideration of the conditions of the liquor industry the manufacture of liquors would also be prohibited. . . . President Wilson on December 26 announced that Major-General Tasker H. Bliss, who reached the retiring age on December 31, would be retained in active service and remain as Chief of Staff of the Army. . . . Final reports on the results of the Halifax explosion gave the loss as 1,500 killed, 4,000 seriously injured, 20,000 homeless, and $50,000,000 in property damage. . . . Senator Francis Griffith Newlands of Nevada died suddenly on December 24 of heart failure. Senator Newlands was in his seventieth year and was chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, in which committee he had done much valuable work. . . . Government officials were quoted as declaring on December 25 that much evidence had been uncovered indicating that the Industrial Workers of the World, the Russian Bolsheviks, the Irish agitators, and other similar organizations, in countries at war with Germany, were seeking to lay the foundation for a world-wide plan to overthrow the present social order. A Russian freighter, the Shilka, which arrived at a Pacific port on December 22 manned by a Bolshevik crew, with an ostensible cargo of hides, was found to have concealed under the hides a large cargo of rifles and ammunition, which it was thought were intended for the I. W. W. in the West. . . . Secretary of State Lansing on December 28 offered the assistance of the United States Government to the Government of Guatemala, whose capital had been partly destroyed by an earthquake which was still continuing at the time of the offer. Other towns in Guatemala suffered slight damage. . . . The President of the United States celebrated his sixty-first birthday on December 28. The only deviation from the daily routine was a birthday dinner to a few friends at the White House. . . . The United States Government on December 29 requisitioned all the electric power at Niagara Falls produced on or imported to the American side of the river.

The War in Europe

ASIDE from artillery duels, which reached particular fierceness in the neighborhood of Verdun and about Rheims, near Cambrai and Ypres, the whole western front remained practically quiet during the week. Although both sides indulged in frequent raids, no major action was attempted.

In Italy the Italians won back the major portion of the positions lost on Monte Asolone. On the western portion of the front along the Asiago sector tremendous pressure, accompanied by concentrated artillery fire, enabled the Teuton troops to break through the Italian first and second lines, the invaders being stopped at the Italian rear positions. The Italians immediately counter-attacked winning back the positions lost to the Germans at Monte Valbello and Col del Rosso. The positions were, however, so completely destroyed by artillery fire and so completely under constant attack by the enemy, that the Italians found it impossible to hold them. On December 26, the Teutons were able to make a slight additional advance near the Col del Rosso.

On December 24 ensign Krylenko, commander-in-chief of the Russian armies, reported to the Bolshevik headquarters that the Germans were transferring large numbers of troops in violation of the armistice agreement, some of them going to the western European front and others being transferred to the southwestern Russian front. Trotzky immediately protested to the German peace delegates. In Palestine during the week the British made more progress north of Jaffa, occupying four more villages, and on the front three and one-half miles north of Jerusalem, after repulsing a determined attack, the British moved forward over two miles and a half on a nine-mile front.

British shipping losses during the week were announced on December 26 to have been eleven merchantmen of 1,600 tons or over, one merchantman under that tonnage, and one fishing vessel. The French lost one ship above and one under 1,600 tons.

Vice Admiral Sir John R. Jellicoe was, on December 26, succeeded as first Lord of the British Admiralty by Vice Admiral Sir Rosslyn Wemyss. Admiral Jellicoe was elevated to the Peerage. The new first Lord had an important part in the battle of Jutland. He is a fighting man, and his appointment is looked upon as a promise of more vigorous action on the part of the British Navy.

French reports of December 29 reported that the German Crown Prince had lost 1,000,000 men in 1917 of whom, the French had captured nearly 70,000. The French also captured 1,400 cannon, thousands of machine guns, trench mortars and other material, and brought down 517 airplanes.

Auto-Intoxication More Deadly Than Warfare

By WARREN WEBSTER

AT a time when so many of our people have sons or relatives at the front, with all the concern and fear for their safety and welfare which such a condition is bound to engender, it is interesting, and I find more or less comforting, to examine into statistics and learn the exact mortality among the men who have been in active service in the real fighting, as compared with that of the people of these United States engaged in peaceful pursuits.

Dependable statistics show that for six months of the year 1916, the mortality percentage of the French Army in service was .012.

During exactly the same period the mortality of residents of the United States was .0135.

It hardly seems conceivable, but these figures, which are absolutely trustworthy, show a higher percentage of mortality among people of peaceful pursuits than those engaged and most actively engaged in warfare.

It may be truthfully claimed that many of these deaths in our country were of people advanced in years.

But if the average age at the time of death was available, it would doubtless be found that it bears a fair comparison with the average age in the armies of France.

The reason for this surprising showing is not far to seek—

The mortality in the army is almost always caused by gunshot or shell wound, because these men in their training are so actively drilled and exercised that their functions work perfectly and all food waste is naturally eliminated from the lower intestine.

Approximately ninety-five per cent. of the mortality in the United States, according to leading physicians and specialists, is caused directly or indirectly by accumulated food waste in the lower intestine, because of our sedentary pursuits and lack of physical hard work or daily exercise.

This accumulated waste contains the deadliest of poison, as you know, and our blood-flow absorbs this poison, distributes it throughout the system, woefully weakening it and lowering our resistance powers so that the disease to which we are most subject has full opportunity to develop and lay us low.

For our country's highest interest, even a more significant phase of this Auto-Intoxication problem is that when it is present, long before you are really ill you are not more than fifty per cent. efficient—

Show me a man who, when bilious, "headachy" or with a disordered digestion, can possibly have that bright, eager, confident outlook or steady nerve so essentially necessary to meet and solve successfully the problems of signs of mild Auto-Intoxication or accumulated waste—

And unless this accumulated waste is properly eliminated, Auto-Intoxication progresses until we are really ill—the seriousness of which depends on the form which the illness takes.

There are more laxative medicines (or physics) taken for this trouble than all other ills combined—but these only partially remove the trouble, are at best only temporary, and, if persisted in, require constantly increasing doses to have any effect at all.

There is, however, an entirely natural, rational way of keeping this waste out of the system entirely—a way which has been constantly growing in general use for the past twenty-five years until now over a million bright, clean, intelligent Americans who believe in Nature treatments are now practicing it—

That way is an occasional Internal Bath with purified warm water by means of the J. B. L. Cascade.

And whenever, as in many, many cases, practicing physicians have adopted this treatment, they are unanimous in their generous and unqualified praise of its effective results.

Chas. A. Tyrrell, M.D., of New York, over twenty-five years ago, restored his own health and strength by Internal Bathing after trying all other known resources without avail, and has ever since that time specialized on this treatment, making it his life's study and work.

Much of this long and valuable experience and the practical cases which have come to his notice, are summed up in a little book, "The What, The Why, The Way of Internal Bathing," which he will be pleased to send free on request if you will address Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mention having read this in Christian Herald.

Inasmuch as the most noted Specialists, including the great Professor Metchnikoff, are agreed that the absence of accumulated waste will positively assure better health, greater strength and much greater efficiency to think and to work, it would certainly seem worth while at least to inform yourself on this subject by writing for the little gift book now, before it passes from your mind.—(Advertisement.)

Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail By HOMER RODEHEAVER

Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

You can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ.

DWIGHT L. MOODY, the greatest evangelist of his day, used to say of Sankey's singing: "It is a question in my mind whether Ira's songs don't win more souls than my preaching."

Homer Rodeheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail."

"Rody" in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associations, to his wife and family.

There are many other songs, each of which Rodeheaver invests with a history of its own. Among them are "Counting the Cost," "If Your Heart Keeps Right," "Mother's Prayers," "Sweeter As the Years Go By," and "I Walk With the King." One that has a unique history is "The Brewers' Big Horses"—the simplest and homeliest of the lot, and the most amusing. You'll laugh with delight at the story.

We will send a copy of "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $240

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $200

A PICTURE PATH to the BIBLE

HOW often we approach some familiar place from an unfamiliar direction—and then what new and hitherto unseen features we discover!

"Why," we say, "I never saw that detail before, though I have been coming here for years—though along another road."

So it is in gaining Bible understanding and insight.

We have read over the familiar verses many times, very probably. But if we approach them from some other direction—that is, through some other method—then indeed we begin to see new and wonderful things which have not been plain to us before!

The Picture Path

THE National Bible Picture Study is a new path to an understanding of the Bible.

It is a picture path, for it consists of 30 Bible pictures.

The act of looking carefully at each picture, to see what it means; then of referring to the Reference Book of Bible verses, to match to the picture the verse that fits it best; and lastly of writing the best verse down in the Answer Book, takes us step after step along a beautiful new path to the Bible. By walking this path many have increased their Bible knowledge, almost without realizing the gain, and tremendously deepened their Bible understanding. Meantime they have found the journey enjoyable and fascinating in itself.

Our Reference Book

To the right appears a page from our Reference Book in the Bible Picture Study. It is called International Bible Readings. This is a compilation of about 2,000 Bible verses, but it is not simply that. It is, word for word, the International Sunday School Lessons, the Daily Home Bible Readings and Golden Texts for December, 1917, and January, February, March and April, 1918. These groups of verses were chosen from the Bible by the Association Lesson Committee, a group of eminent Bible authorities.

Think what happiness there must be in having such a book with you, for daily reading and communion. You will see with pleasure the Reading for each day; you will read interestedly the Lesson for each approaching Sunday, and then follow the Daily Readings which explain or add to the Lesson. You will review past Lessons and Readings, and store your mind with the Golden Texts which say so much in so few words.

Look at the Bible portion for today—Wednesday, January 9th. It has been chosen for you for this day. Read it. Then remember that while reading it you are refreshing your memory with Bible thoughts that may apply to some of the 30 pictures of the Bible Picture Study. You are reading selected portions of the Bible, at the same time fitting yourself to understand those portions better—and to compete successfully in the $5,000.00 competition.

$5,000.00 in Rewards

In order to give a definite conclusion to our Study, and increase the competitive spirit of all participants, we offer large cash awards to those who submit the 1,001 best sets of verses for the 30 pictures. The rewards aggregate $5,000.00 in cash, and start with a prize of $1,000.00 in cash. Second prize is $750.00 in cash, third prize $500.00, and 998 other prizes.

No one need do anything, in order to become eligible to strive for one of these rewards, except to submit a list of Bible verses for the 30 pictures, choosing the verses from the 2,000 which we republish in International Bible Readings. Competition without expense is possible, as explained in the rules, which are free on request.

An Answer Book, in which to write down and submit the verses you select for the pictures, is sent you as part of the Outfit, along with International Bible Readings,

Jesus Tempted as We Are

HEBREWS 4: 14-16

14 Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession.

15 For we have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

HEBREWS 5: 1-9

1 For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins:

2 Who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity.

3 And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins.

4 And no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron.

5 So also Christ glorified not himself to be made a high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee.

6 As he saith also in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

7 Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared;

8 Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered;

9 And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him;

The Work of Jesus Foretold

ISAIAH 42: 1-8

1 Behold my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles.

2 He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in anger, nor shall he break, and the smother.

ing flax shall he not quench; he shall bring forth judgment unto truth.

4 He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth: and the isles shall wait for his law.

5 Thus saith God the LORD, he that creeth heavens, and stretched them out; he that stretcheth out the earth as a tent.

and all back pictures, if you desire them. Pictures Nos. 9 and 10 are published today, and all 30 pictures will appear in the Christian Herald.

Hurry your order for the complete Outfit, so that you may begin without any delay. There is plenty of time, of course, to compete at your leisure—but that is the very reason why you should start now, and not delay until you will be rushed, and so not able to submit your best work.

Today is the day to start. You will, we know, be glad indeed that you entered the Study. It will please you, and interest the whole family immensely. Who knows but that you will win a cash prize, too, as well as the prize of greater Bible knowledge? Remember that 1,001 people will be sent rewards!

Look at the two Study pictures below. Doesn't each picture suggest some Scripture story? Don't you think that you could find a Bible verse, among the 2,000 in International Bible Readings, that describes what is shown in each picture? Those who send in the most applicable verses for the 30 pictures will be given the $5,000.00 in cash rewards!

BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

His Father's Moment

By Cushing Stetson

FOR the twentieth time in the forty-eight hours since he had returned to us—"incapacitated for the remainder of the war"—I noticed the trench-pallor in his face; and as he laid his hand on mine, his mother's words came back:

"What so terribly preys upon his mind, I do not know; he will not tell. It is not his wound. The doctor has told him that rest, new scenes, new faces, new interests, will make him fit and strong as two years ago. When the moment comes let him speak to you frankly, father. Let him talk."

And now, as his fingers closed over mine, the moment, I knew, had come. He went straight to the point:

"Word reached me in the trenches—in Lorraine, before we started in—that you and mother had moved. But even then I did not guess. We all knew, or we ought to have known, that business here at home would be bad."

"It has been a bit slow—"
His fingers a little tightened their grip. "I know. But I wish I could have been here to help. I can not bear that mother should have given up the old house—for this back street."

"It is not a back street," I said. "If I could have been here," he began again. Then he turned more fully to face me. "The doctor says I must have a rest—before I begin, before I go to the office—should take a rest of a month."

"Two months—as long as you like."

THE anxiety, the suffering in his eyes was difficult to bear. He shook his head. "No, father. Please listen to me. I left home a boy, but no man comes out of the trenches who is still a boy. You must talk to me."

"But what is it, son?"

"I am not thinking of myself," he answered slowly, "except how, after these two years, I can best turn to and help out. I am still weak, it is true, and I think the doctor right when he says a rest would make me all right. But rest takes money and time. Now about the office, father. Tell me about that. Why are you and mother in these three small rooms?"

For answer I unlocked a drawer in my desk, and with an envelope in my hand went back to him.

"Boy," I said, "this change, these rooms, were your mother's own idea. You have been for two years fighting the enemy in France; we, the older people, left behind, have been having our own fight too. It has taken five men at home," I reminded him, "to support one soldier."

"Now your mother," I went on, "from the moment you left, grew restless, wanted a change. I think your empty room was a constant reminder that you had gone. We talked things over, she and I. We hit on this little place to live till you came back. You see—you see there was no need of paying rent on an empty room all those two years. The money was better placed in the Liberty Loan, in War Certificates, and Stamps." I placed the envelope in his hand.

Mechanically he opened it and drew out $1,000 in bonds, $200 in War Certificates, and a bulky package of stamps, $48 worth altogether.

"You see," I said before he could speak, "every cent of this money helped to keep you safe abroad. Every cent of this money can now restore your health, now you are home. Every cent of this money your government needed to win the war. It cost your mother and me nothing; we would have spent it on you anyhow if you had been home."

The papers trembled in his hand; he made great effort at self-control, an effort to speak.

"Listen, father. At Aix-la-Chapelle the Germans once . . ."

But I did not hear him. His mother stood in the door, radiant, till she came swiftly to kneel by his side.

"At Aix-la-Chapelle," I heard my boy repeat.

But again I did not listen. There he had had his moment. This moment was mine.

Success with Flowers

Are your plants, vines, and shrubbery doing well? Have you had success with your flowers or do they look sickly and thriftless? Do you realize that "scraggly" plants are worse than no plants at all? The difference between weak, thriftless, off-colored plants, and healthy, luxuriant, rich colored flowers and foliage, is the difference between success and failure. If your plants are not doing well, chances are they need food. They are being starved and are an eyesore and a source of annoyance rather than pleasure, but don't throw them away, use

Red Snapper Plant Food

These Plants Thrive With Red Snapper Plant Food

RED SNAPPER PLANT FOOD is a wonderfully rich, very nutritious, yet harmless fertilizer for plants of this kind. Its effect can be noticed within a few days after the first application. Color of foliage becomes a darker green and flowers and blossoms take on a beauty of coloring and size beyond all expectations—the wonder and admiration of all who see them. It is made from the head bones and nitrogenous cartilage of the South American Red Snapper fish, dried under intense heat, mixed with other organic plant food to make a perfectly balanced ration, then ground and bolted in flour mill machinery into a fine meal. It is thoroughly sterilized, clean and sanitary, to be used in the finest homes and conservatories as well as for outside use. Put up in 2 lb. cans including as 8 oz. package of RED SNAPPER Plant Tonic which is used to give the plants quicker start. Price 60c. Also put up in 12 1/2 lb. burlap paper lined sacks. Price $1.00. For sale by all leading Florists, Druggists, Grocers and Nurseries. Ask your dealers. If they have not got it, send us their names and we will see that they get it for you. For your trouble we will send postage prepaid, our valuable booklet "HOUSE PLANTS AND FLOWER GARDENS—Their Care and Culture," which contains fourteen chapters of general information. This is worth 50c alone to any lover of flowers. Dealers who are not already taking this product should send for our Introductory Sales Proposition. Young People's Topics for January 20

Young Christians Reaching Outward
*Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topics, Gal. 6:1-10*

THERE is a game that boys play known as "pass it along." The thing passed may be a word or a thump, and the game may be at times a bit rough, but it illustrates the core of this topic better than anything we can think of at the moment. The Christian life is a game of "pass it along." We have received the words of eternal life. In every corner of the world men are dying in sin and in terror for the lack of the message of life and light. We must bear the message; we must "pass it along."

There is another illustration. An expansive force held under pressure exerts the same degree of energy in all directions. It seeks to spread itself. Every square inch of an automobile cylinder must withstand the pressure that impels the piston. Expansive force must result in controlled movement, if work is to be done. The force of love in the human heart is a greater expansive force than T. N. T. if it is a love begotten by the divine spirit of Christ. With this force in motion the work of the Kingdom is certain to be done.

We are told in the lesson that if we sow spiritual seed we shall reap life everlasting. As if to identify this spiritual seed, the next verse tells us not to be weary in well-doing, for we shall reap if we faint not. And the next tells us to do good to all men as we have opportunity, especially those of the household of faith. Thus the limit of our outreach is embraced within that all. It is a message for young hearts that faint not. Youth is always intolerant of limits. Young eyes are never satiated with the mountains in sight; they seek to know what lies beyond. The apostle here shows us our field, the harrowed hearts of all mankind. He tells us to sow therein spiritual seed; good works, kind deeds, comforting words, acts of helpfulness, sowing always in faith and fertilizing with the word of truth; and he shows us, beyond the far-visited ridge of the years, a certain harvest which is life everlasting, a harvest which we begin to reap even as we sow.

Epworth League Topic. Ps. 63:1-8

THIS topic was treated in last week's Christian Herald, being the Christian Endeavor Topic for January 13. Leaders might well build their discussion of the topic around the League motto, "Look up, Lift up." We can not reach in a direction in which we do not look; at least we can not reach thus with any certainty. We can not hold up our hands toward infinite heaven and keep our eyes on the finite things of earth. We can only reach upward with all our energies when our eye is fixed on things above. And when our own preaching is rooted in a clear vision of the Lord above, we will find our hand more potent to lift up others.

ALL ARRANGED. "Brown has definite notions about his own funeral."
"How is that?"
"He says he will attend it in a body."

EXPLORATION ENDED. Little Mary one day strayed from her governess into the kitchen, where Cortez, the cook, was opening a chicken. As the cook probed deeper and deeper and removed one part after another, Mary became greatly interested. At last Cortez paused and Mary saw her opportunity. With childlike innocence she queried: "Did oo find what oo was lookin' for?"

HIS TASTE WAS GOOD. Eva was a tiny lassie who seldom received fine ribbons. So she was very proud when an aunt gave her a big pink sash. The following Sunday Eva's mother arranged the sash in a big bow at her side. On her arrival at the church, as she was busily rearranging her bow the minister came along and said, "Well, Miss Eva, that's a very pretty bow." Without looking up, she replied, "Thank you," and added, "That's a very pretty tie you are wearing." Receiving no response, she glanced up, and saw she was addressing the minister, who was wearing his clerical gown. Then she hastily said, "I mean it would be a nice one if you had one on."

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 6421 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book, that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry. (Advertisement.)

ONE WAY TO SAVE

"Everything costs so much!"

We hear it on every side. More than ever we must spend with care—must make our money go as far as possible—must know what we are getting.

We do this when we buy goods with a name—goods with a reputation—advertised goods.

Advertised goods are standardized. The maker's name or trademark is a bond of quality. He must live up to the claims he makes or he cannot continue to advertise because

- (1) People will not "come back" for more.
- (2) Publications that value their readers' interests will not accept his advertising.

You are practising true economy when you buy goods advertised in CHRISTIAN HERALD. The advertiser stands back of them to see that you are satisfied.

Questions and Answers

HERE is an interesting letter from Rev. R. D. Zook, a Methodist preacher in charge of a church of that denomination at Park City, Utah, in which he tells how welcome the Christian Herald is among the people of his district. "I am an ex-Moody Bible Institute student, and I see the value of your paper in the homes of the people of this place. These people are not all members of my church by any means; some are Mormons, Catholics, and many other beliefs. I want to introduce this great paper into other homes here, as I am able to do so. The religion that the world needs today is upheld and preached in this paper in such a way that it is applicable to all Protestant people, and I would like to see it in every home in this world. We need not throw away our own church paper to take this one; but this paper is valuable in such a field as mine, for I have workers in my church from all denominations, who read your paper where they would not think of reading mine, because it is Methodist, they think. This paper to me seems to be what I need to make the people of my field (and I am the only Protestant preacher here in a mining camp of 5,000 people, except one Episcopalian) realize that religion is not creed but Christ, and that I am not trying to simply get people to join church, but to let God join them in him through his Son. We are living in an age when, if the world ever needed the preaching of the old-fashioned Gospel (which is the only Gospel worth while), it is now."

B. E. E., Chatham, N. Y. Almag trees, as mentioned in I Kings 10 : 11 and II Chron. 9 : 10, were no doubt sandalwood. This sandalwood is the produce of a low shrub resembling privet, but remarkable for the fragrance of the central part of the stem near the root. It was brought from India, where it is indigenous on the coast of Malabar. One of its numerous names there is valgulka.

Jennie H., Washington. Any amusement which is in the nature of a stumbling-block to spiritual growth should be avoided. The promiscuous acquaintances and doubtful companionship of the ballroom are likely to be such stumbling-blocks, since in the very nature of things there are liable to be occasions for intimacies far beyond those permitted under any other surroundings, and apart from those which uplift and tend to betterment. Hence, one who dances takes chances of getting in intimate touch with persons and influences which may readily be detrimental to morals and spiritual uplift.

Why not take the safe attitude and by letting doubtful amusements entirely alone, avoid even "the appearance of evil"?

H. A., Pascoag, R. I. 1. Your record of fifty-six years' choir singing is a remarkable come with power' (which is more explicit), and Luke 'Till they see the Kingdom of God.' Also that it was believed to refer to the realization of the firm establishment and victorious progress of the new Kingdom of Christ. He did not refer to his second coming, that her husband, Cyex, was drowned (says the legend), she cast herself into the sea; and the gods, to reward the devotion of the pair to each other, changed them into halcyons or kingfishers. According to the poets, the sea was always calm while these birds built their nests; and ancient naturalists write that they built their nests during the seven days immediately preceding the winter solstice, and laid their eggs in the seven immediately following. Hence these were called "halcyon days." The term applies now to times of peace and happiness.

Mrs. R. C., Paterson, Wash. Address Surgeon-General Gorgas, care of War Department, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. R. H. R., Summit, N. J. We have no means of knowing about the moving picture contest mentioned, but think that probably the quickest way of finding out would be to address the newspaper in which the advertisement appeared.

Anna V. T. C., Owen's Cross Roads, Ala. Solveig is the name of the heroine in Ibsen's story "Peer Gynt." The connection intended is centered in the appearance of Gila in the guise of a simple, modest and unassuming girl, such as Solveig was.

Subscriber, Springfield, O. Please explain Eccles. 7 : 16.

Commentators interpret the phrase "righteous overmuch" as descriptive of religious presumption; of that self-made righteousness which would lay the greatest stress upon outward performance and would claim personal credit for results which the true believer recognizes as the gift of divine grace alone. Pharisaism, with its assumption of superior virtue, its multitudinous observances and its devotion to form and ceremonial, forgetting the things of the spirit, was the type of the over-righteous.

Doubter, Washington, D. C. Are our days numbered? When persons die from unnatural causes, do you think our heavenly Father intended that to be the manner of their death?

Our days are not numbered in the sense that each individual has just so many days to live. Nor do we believe that the time and manner of death are inflexibly fixed in advance. Such a belief would be fatalism, and would logically lead to the conclusion that, if destiny controls in all things, man is powerless and therefore irresponsible. The Almighty has ordained certain natural laws, and conformity with these laws or disobedience to them is within our own control. Violation brings pain and death; obedience health and the full measure of existence.

Yet, while we are free to choose either course, it is not to be questioned that divine omniscience foresees all things.

M. E. D., Eldorado Springs, Mo., writes: "His eye is on the sparrow." Does He see? Does He care? Is there a soul anywhere on his footstool for whom Jesus did not die? The rulers of the earth do not believe in Jesus, otherwise there would be no war." Wars are the result of sin, national or individual, and as long as sin exists in the world there will be wars (James 4). There are many good people who have heart-burnings over this subject. Dr. Gray's articles now running in the Christian Herald will be found very helpful to a better understanding of the question.

A Conference of Israel

A CONFERENCE "on behalf of Israel" will be held in Chicago, January 22 to 25, 1918, in the Moody Tabernacle. All pastors, evangelists and others who are interested in the future of the Jews and of their ancient homeland are invited to attend. A list of well-known speakers includes Revs. W. B. Riley, A. B. Simpson, William Fetter, Charles Galaudet Trumbull, Paul Rader, S. B. Rohold, A. C. Gaebelein, and others.

THERE'S a purple road that's leading to a country far away.
There's a purple road to Somewhere that is calling us today;
Like a vagrant satin ribbon, it is winding through the plain—
There's a purple road that's calling, and it may not call again!

What if hills loom up before us? There's a castle at the top;
There are vivid bits of garden where a way-farer may stop;
And slim poplars cast their shadows at the noontide of the day
On the purple road that's leading to a country far away.

Will you take my hand and follow up the winding purple path?
Yes, there may be rocks to stay us—we may meet a tempest's wrath;
We may shrink before pale lightning, we may cower under rain,
But the road is calling, calling—and it may not call again!

We have Youth and Hope for comrades and True Love will be our guide,
And we'll meet our great adventure walking proudly side by side,
For the purple road is Romance, and it's calling me and you
To a Golden Spot in Somewhere—to the Land where Dreams come true.

one. We have heard of no longer service. 2. While there is no passage that asserts explicitly that a person goes directly to heaven after death, there are several from which the inference can be drawn. Among others are the assurance of Christ to the thief on the cross; the parable of the rich man and Lazarus; another is Phil. 1 : 23, in which Paul says he desires to depart and be with Christ, implying that his death would give him that felicity. 3. We find the assurance of heavenly recognition in both the Old and New Testaments. David said of his dead son, "I shall go to him." See also the parable of Lazarus and Dives, and see Phil. 3 : 20; Heb. 12 : 1; Rev. 6 : 9; Rom. 14 : 12. These and other passages indicate the preservation of identity. We have no reason to doubt that the redeemed will know each other, that friendship begun on earth will there be perfected, and that we shall know the saints and our dear ones. Heaven is the Christian's fatherland, where we shall see our friends and know them.

J. R. Gottschalk, Blooming Glen, Pa., writes: "I noticed in the Editorial Forum the article, 'Can You Help to Solve It?' The Mail-Bag several years ago, discussing Matt. 16 : 28, Mark 9 : 1 and Luke 9 : 27, as to the meaning of these Scriptures, said that this passage is frequently misunderstood. Mark has it: 'Till they see the Kingdom of God but to the founding and triumphant extension of that work during the lifetime of some then present, the acceptance of which by the world was to be the grand pledge of his return. This view has always been my understanding of his teaching on the subject. The Gospel of the Kingdom has a solution for all of our difficulties, in the religious, educational, commercial and political world, as Christ's mission was to free men from all kinds of bondage. Our physical world, the animal creation, and everything that has suffered through Adam's sin, shall be redeemed and restored through Christ. This is God's world, and the teachings of the Kingdom must obtain."

J. H. W., Pennsylvania The image of God in which Adam was created did not consist in form or features, nor even in intellect, nor in his immortality, but in his moral nature and in the character of his entire being. If the edict of the Creator, "Let us make man in our own image," was addressed to those spiritual beings that serve him, then it may well be inferred that man, in his original state, was a bright and beautiful being in character, disposition and appearance, resembling the angels.

SAVE ONE HALF YOUR TABLE EXPENSE

FIFTY percent of your table expense during the greater part of the year is for things that could easily be grown in your own garden.—At such a time as the present food conservation is of vital importance but your own garden means more than food saving: it means the creation of food. Every article on your table that comes crisp and fresh from your own garden counts double in the economic resources of our country. Every plot of available ground should be utilized to the best advantage. Not only more gardens but better gardens is the urgent need.

Better gardens can be had by the use of higher quality of seeds and by improving the methods of planting. The seventy-one years of experience in seed raising and selling that is behind every packet of Henderson's seeds should and does make them the best that it is possible to obtain. "Henderson's Tested Seeds" are all that the name implies.

Not only must your seeds be the best but your methods should be right. And to help in this we have prepared a booklet entitled "Better Gardens." This consists of extracts from the book, "Garden Guide and Record," which we have published for a number of years for the use of our customers only.—"Better Gardens" will be sent to all who send us ten cents for our special offer below:

"Everything for the Garden"

is the title of our Annual Catalogue. It is really a book of 192 pages, handsomely bound, with a beautifully embossed cover, 16 color plates and 1000 half-tones, direct from photographs, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a library of everything worth while, either in farm, garden or home.

A Remarkable Offer of Henderson's Seed Specialties

To demonstrate the superiority of Henderson's Tested Seeds, we have made up a Henderson Collection, consisting of one packet each of the following six great specialties:

Ponderosa Tomato

Big Boston Lettuce

White Tipped Scarlet Radish

Henderson's Invincible Asters

Henderson's Brilliant Mixture Poppies

Spencer Mammoth Waved Sweet Peas

In order to obtain the largest possible distribution for our annual catalogue, "Everything for the Garden," we make the following unusual offer: Mail us 10c and we will send you the catalogue, together with this remarkable "Henderson Specialty Collection."

Every Empty Envelope Counts as Cash

This collection is enclosed in a coupon envelope which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as 25c cash payment on any order for seeds, plants or bulbs amounting to one dollar, or over.

NEVER before have business conditions been so disturbed as in the present year. Trained men have been withdrawn from every line to put the country on a war basis.

And the seed trade has been no exception to the rule, hence we urge our customers to send in their orders at once, before the Spring rush begins.

It will be a vast help to us in doing our part in feeding the country to be able to execute orders in January and February that in ordinary times come to us in March and April.

So, whether you buy from us or any other seed house, send in your order early.

Questions and Answers

G. F. M., Carman, Ill., writes: "In the Mail-Bag of October 31 is a letter from G. M. W., Fairmont, Minn., in which I think he gave pretty straight goods. We need preachers who will say the same thing in the pulpit and give the people to understand that living up to the rules of a lodge, or a church either, will not make one a Christian. Before one can become a Christian he must be regenerated. I have been told so many times by lodge people that if one lived up to the lodge rules he would become a Christian, that I have had some question cards printed which I am giving out to set people thinking. I noticed with gladness that the young men in the training camps hear the Gospel preached. It would be a good thing if we could induce those who are not in the training camps to go where they would hear the Gospel for once in their lives. To me, this war is the destruction of humanity, by its own inventions. It is a flood of fire. What nation is in the ark of safety?"

Several Readers. While the prospects that the world's production of sugar during the crop year just beginning will be greater than last year's by 303,209 tons, a most important question is as to how this crop is distributed. The American sugar supply is drawn almost entirely from within our borders (including insular possessions) and from Cuba. According to recent figures, the supplies on which the United States draws are forecast to be increased during the coming year by 255,087 tons over last year, and by 338,440 tons over year before last. Of the sources outside our own sphere on which the Allies draw (if not prevented by lack of shipping space), Java and Mauritius are the most important. In these countries the increase forecast for the coming year over last year is 244,896 tons; over year before last, 683,094 tons. Production forecasts from all European countries indicate a sharp decrease from last year's crop as well as a decrease from the pre-war period. The production of England, France, and Italy is 51,951 tons below last year's production, and 866,863 tons below the pre-war production. The decrease for Russia is 289,990 tons under last year. The decrease for Spain, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Norway and Sweden is 126,439 tons compared with last year. In Germany and Austria-Hungary (to which must be added Belgium's crop), the decrease compared with last year is 289,195. England, France and Italy need sugar and need it badly. The burden falls heavily upon the western hemisphere, and especially upon the United States and Cuba. To supply this urgent need continuously necessitates rigid economy on our part.

Practical, Elizabethtown, N. Y. The question is one which involves the whole subject of amusements. On general principles, and to avoid profitless controversy, we should say that any amusement that can be classed as doubtful had better be omitted.

Mrs. W. A. Z., Allendale, N. J., writes: "I certainly hope Congress will amend the second-class postage rate, especially as it affects the Christian papers. It would be dreadful if we have to give up all the papers and magazines. What a dearth there would be in the land! The Christian papers are doing so much good in the world, I would not know how to give them up. The Christian Herald is full of good things, from cover to cover. I have always loved this paper, and I pass it over to another party who cannot afford to buy it, but who certainly enjoys it."

S. R. W., Oakland, Calif. Hunger-strikes are resorted to more for publicity's sake, or to arouse sympathy, than for any other purpose. In some cases they have resulted in physical

It is well to remember, however, that no one who is not himself a true believer can be a real pastor. Men have been converted after entering the ministry; but for an unconverted minister to assume the task of leading others to Christ is an anomaly.

Rev. H. M. Tjernagel, Crookston, Minn. (formerly local superintendent of the Teller reindeer herd), writes correcting certain misstatements in Francis J. Dickie's article on "Reindeer Beef from Alaska." Mr. Tjernagel's letter says: "A three-year-old steer, dressed, will weigh 120 to 150 pounds. Perhaps 130 pounds is a fair average. The state-hand, knowing it to be wrong and sinful yet despising the Word of God. The willing sinner is one who wills to sin. Nor is it a single act that is denounced, but a permanent state, continuance in a sinful course, and such continuance as implies apostasy. It is the state of one who has received the knowledge of the truth and knows it to be the truth, and yet gives up the Gospel, treading under foot the Son of God, and offering insult to the Spirit of grace. The act of crucifying Christ afresh is doubly dangerous as it becomes a habit, and it is partly through that settled habit that it is impossible, humanly speaking, to renew the sinner again to repentance. The apostle says he cannot so renew men whose hearts are so hard and whose condition is so desperate as theirs. God can, but he cannot. Such a transformation is a "miracle of grace."

A. L. W., Los Angeles, Calif. In the twenty-two divisions or stanzas of the 119th Psalm the first letter of each verse (in the Hebrew) gives the name to the stanza. This Psalm is believed to have been intended to be used as a manual of pious instruction, chiefly for the young, and its distinctive construction was doubtless meant as an aid in committing it to memory. It exalts the law and emphasizes the priceless value of God's Word as a subject of constant study.

J. T. C., Des Moines, Iowa. Please explain Judges 7:5.

In explaining why the peculiarity of method in drinking showed character, it is necessary first to inquire what qualities Gideon thought necessary to find in his followers. According to the view of the commentators, the plan he had formed could only be carried out by men who would do precisely as they were told, would keep silence, yet be thoroughly on the alert to act with promptitude at an appointed moment. Only men who could control themselves could be trusted. Hence, Gideon watched his men at the well; some bowed down on their knees and luxuriated in a leisurely draught; those he could not use. Others continued standing, stooping so far only as to be able to reach the water with their hands, the hollow of which they filled and then brought it rapidly to the mouth, jerking in the refreshing contents. These latter had their minds not on the water-drinking, but on their work, and spent just enough time and energy on the water-drinking, and these, who thought first thought of their work, Gideon could use.

Mrs. T. W., Winona, Wis. Are we to understand that Ahaz sacrificed his son to Moloch?

The account in 11 Kings 16:3 bears out the contention. A commentary says: "The fact which seems to be certain is that Ahaz adopted the Moloch-worship of the Ammonites and Moabites, and sacrificed at least one son, probably his first-born, according to the horrid rites of those nations. A king of Moab had once done the same when he found himself in a sore strait (11 Kings 3:27). Another had expressed his willingness so to appease his god (Micah 6:7). Hitherto the Jews had been guiltless of the abomination. Now, however, as the time of more searching trial approached, as dangers thickened and the national existence was seen to be in peril, the awful rite seems to have exercised a fatal fascination upon them. It has been suggested that the cause of its sudden appearance and prevalence from the time of Ahaz to the close of the Jewish kingdom is to be found in the influence of Assyria, which now first came to be much felt in Palestine. But the Assyrians had no god Moloch, who in Scripture is always connected with Ammon, and there seems no doubt that it was from Ammon that the Jews adopted the practice."

E. T., Loyce, Fla. Please explain Isa. 42:2 and 3.

This is one of the Messianic prophecies, and is descriptive mainly of the retiring, humble and kindly characteristics of our Lord; so humble that he withdrew himself from the public fame created by his miracles to privacy (Matt. 12:15); so kindly that he can feel for the bruised reed and not break it.

Subscriber, Bangor, Me. The Red Cross has repeatedly stated publicly that all knitting done for it and under its direction is devoted exclusively to the needs of our soldiers and sailors. The Red Cross also furnishes supplies of various kinds for the needs of our Allies, and is constantly sending help to the stricken countries of Europe. LI'L BROTHER

By

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN I kiss you, li'l brother,
Seems as if my love could rise an smother
All th' ugly things upon th' earth;
Seems as if all happiness an' mirth
Gathers on th' rosy cheek o' you,
Breakin' through
Where your dimple lives. . . .
Guess God gives
Li'l baby angels, sometimes, to us Jus' to see how much o' good they'll do us!

When I kiss you, li'l brother,
Seems like we was made for one another;
Seems like rainbow colors swim aroun'
me,
Seems as if some wonder thing has foun'
me;
Seems as if there comes a far-off singin',
Sorter bringin' Dreams o' things that I can't understand. . . .
Your soft hand,
Li'l brother, as you touch me, love me,
Makes me know th' heaven-land above weakness that threatened to result fatally. The usual treatment of such cases is to feed the hunger-striker with liquid nourishment by means of a tube let into the stomach. This is known as "forcible feeding."

Reader, Molson, Wash. The various organizations engaged in spiritual and social work among the soldiers are doing their best. All our information gives assurance of this. Write to the secretary of the Red Cross organization in your district.

Reader, Jackson, Miss. I am still undecided as to whether or not I was really called to preach, or whether I just imagined I was. What do you think constitutes a call to preach? I wish I were certain that such was my calling, because I feel that I might be able to do a good work, but I don't want to enter the ministry unless I am certain that God has called me.

The call to preach is evidenced in a deep and sincere desire to serve God by giving the Gospel to the world. One who undertakes this work should, first of all, be himself a true Christian, firmly holding to and believing in the fundamental truths of the Gospel and accepting Christ as his personal Saviour. He should make every sacrifice to get the proper preparation for the work, that he may be an efficient pastor or missionary. Assuming him to possess a fair amount of talent, and to have a genuine desire to win souls, and also that he has had the necessary studies and training, he should trust in God and go forward to the work, resolved to do his best. If the call be insistent and his heart keeps constantly urging him, he should not hesitate to make the choice.

ment that 'the average full-grown beast will dress at a very low average 500 pounds' is consequently rather too far from the mark to leave uncorrected. In June, 1911, there were in Alaska, according to government statistics, 33,629 reindeer. Granting that they now 'number full a hundred thousand' Uncle Sam would 'stand in command of an army of beef weighing' 13,000,000—not 37,000,000—if all the females were steers and all the calves, yearlings and two-year-olds were three-year-olds averaging 130 pounds apiece. Reindeer are prime for butchering in the fall when they have their winter coat on. Winter skins are not valuable. If Mr. Dickie would offer an Alaska reindeer-man $5 per pound for the skin of a butchered steer, I am satisfied he could get the carcass thrown in. During the years 1910-1913, when I was local superintendent of the herd at Teller, Alaska, winter skins sold for $2 to $3 apiece, and then the skins were far more numerous than cash buyers. From the summer of 1892 up to and including 1902, when importations ceased, 1,280 and not 3,000 reindeer were imported."

To quote a commentator: "In a sense, all sin implies the consent of the will for a time, and yet there is a distinction. Paul was a blasphemer and a persecutor; but he did it ignorantly, in unbelief. Peter was a true disciple; nevertheless he denied Christ with curses and oaths, but rather apparently through passing fear than wilfully. The expression seems to be taken from Num. 15:30, 31, where sinning wilfully is described as doing something presumptuously, with a high

Mrs. Norton in the Belgian first line trenches. This picture was taken while a bombardment was proceeding

MILITARY hospitals in France are, as a rule, cheerless places, and it seems to have fallen to the lot of the Belgian soldier to inhabit the most cheerless of all.

So thinks little Jean Baptiste as his gaze wanders for the many thousandth time from his own bed, gray-blanketed and none too clean, around the bare stone walls of the hospital room which at a former time was probably an assembly room for the monks of this particular monastery; and as he thinks, he must wink hard to keep back the tears, for he has been told he must not cry, as that brings on the hemorrhages which he has learned to dread.

He is so young, only seventeen, and has lain there already so many months with this tearing cough. It seems very long since he said good-bye to the weeping mother and sisters in Antwerp, going forth, a mere lad, to fight his country's battles for liberty against overwhelming odds.

It was that first dreadful winter that brought on his illness. There were not uniforms enough for the new and hastily recruited Belgian army, and so it was that little Jean Baptiste, with thousands of others, must fight on, thinly clad, with no warm overcoat or underwear, and when socks and civilian boots gave out, with their feet shod in wooden sabots, they still fought on.

With no shelter of well-built trenches, but ever falling back inch by inch before a merciless enemy, which they were resisting with almost superhuman strength, at last they reached the narrow Yser, and there they stopped. "We will go no farther," they said; "so much of our country shall yet be ruled by our king; the enemy shall not entirely dispossess him." Nor has the enemy yet crossed the Yser, though three years have passed. That gallant little band of Belgian soldiers still keeps vigil there, awaiting the time when they shall obey the order, "Forward!" and shall turn their faces again, a victorious army, toward their beloved land.

BUT by the time the Yser was reached, little Jean Baptiste had fallen a victim to the awful hardships he had endured, and for him there was to be no more fighting, perhaps never more a sight of his loved ones. Only there remain for him the gray stone walls of the hospital and the gray blanket on his bed until the end comes.

But some way he hears, possibly from a fellow-sufferer, of a lady in London who, with her husband, has "a good heart for the Belgian soldier." Wonderful to relate, the story said that these people loved best the most hopeless and lonely, and loved nothing more than to take the place of family and friends to these heart-broken ones. So in a childish, unformed hand, he writes this lady of the loving heart:

DEAR MADAME: I have heard that you have a good heart for the Belgian soldier, and I dared to write you, for I am so sad. Behold two years that I hear never from home, and always I suffer. Dear Madame, forgive my boldness, but is it possible that I might address you as my "dear little maman," the name is so sweet.

So began my acquaintance with little Jean Baptiste. To soul and body we endeavored to minister, and soon it was a transformed Jean. He wrote:

"Oh, ma bien chère maman, it is as you say; my sickness it is a gift of God, because it seems to me I am truly happy. It is not my soul that is sick, and it is much better to be sick of the body than of the soul, and I render thanks to God. I confide myself completely to him, and if it is his will, he will heal me. I desire so much to have a Bible, chère maman, I pray you to send me a Bible; le bon Dieu will recompense you. In hoping to have some comforting news from you I close with many big kisses.

Your son who loves you in our Lord Jesus Christ,
JEAN BAPTISTE VAN G—."

LATER, at my suggestion, he told me of some warm undergarments of which he stood in need. Just a little time before an American business man had placed in our hands a cherished five-dollar gold piece which had belonged to his boy, "my only son," he said huskily, "and taken from us very suddenly; use it for one of your Belgian boys."

So it was this gold piece that bought for Jean the warm, comforting shirts and socks he desired. The coveted Bible went to him also, and the following letter sets forth his gratitude:

I hasten to acknowledge the beautiful Bible and linen. I am very happy to have a Bible and be able to read and meditate upon the Word of God, which is our life, our hope, our all, for we belong to our Sovereign Creator.

Dear maman, how shall I thank you for all your goodness? I promise you that I will always be a good Christian and do all I can to lead all my soldier friends into the good path, and to tell them about the Word of God. I will be like a little pastor, a preacher, and God will be pleased with me.

I am well now, and I hope that you and your dear husband are in good health.

So the months have sped by since first we heard from Jean. Still he suffers, but ever he grows stronger and surer in his faith in his unseen Friend and Divine Master.

What a contrast to our little Jean Baptiste would be Caporal Maurice present, if they could be seen side by side. I should have spoken of him as le Chevalier Bogaert, for when King Albert pinned on his breast the highest decoration in his power to give and kissed him on both cheeks, he said to him, "Now you are le Chevalier Bogaert, and your family will all be very proud of you," and the Queen, also kissing him, asked him all about his family, brushing away her tears as she spoke.

When we first met Maurice in London he was wearing on his tunic the beautiful decoration, and later on he told us his story.

Ordered by his commanding officer to retake an outpost which the Germans had previously captured, he set out in the dead of night with two men and a supporting party following him. The Germans had discovered their approach and were subjecting the small party to a pitiless gunfire. One of his men dropped dead by his side and the other man too was struck and hurled bodily into the River Yser.

THEN came the most terrible moment of Maurice's life. It was suicidal to go on; to wait for the supporting party would be to give the German

Stricken Guatemala Appeals for Help

ON December 28 the world knew that there had been a serious earthquake in Guatemala, and that the capital, Guatemala City, had been badly shattered. The American State Department was prompt to offer to the stricken country all the help its sister in the North could render.

The first shock, at 11 o'clock on Christmas night, was followed by a series of other shocks, the worst of which came on December 29, completely demolishing those structures in the capital city which had been left standing by the earlier shocks. On December 30 news reached the United States by the Navy Wireless that Guatemala City had been entirely destroyed; that 125,000 people were homeless in the streets; that parts of the country were very cold and windy, and that tents were badly needed.

In the first shock of the earthquake the Colon Opera House in Guatemala City collapsed during a performance, killing many of the audience. Numbers of others were killed by falling walls as the vibrations continued. A great many people took refuge in the American legation, which stood until the 28th, when it was also destroyed. Hospitals, asylums, prisons, sugar mills, government buildings, legations, churches, railway structures, were all demolished, and deep earth fissures opened in the middle of the city. The inhabitants were in panic, and it was reported that the stock of provisions in the city was very scant and that relief would be required promptly.

Salvador suspended its usual holiday merrymaking over the New Year and turned to the help of her sister republic. The American Red Cross immediately took steps for the earliest possible relief of was asked to organize a relief committee among the American residents.

The Christian Herald received a telegram on January 2 from the American missionaries. The telegram is printed elsewhere on this page. A check for $1,000 was immediately drawn and the money wired to Guatemala City. We know that the Christian Herald Family will approve of this prompt relief to our Latin American neighbors in distress. It is Halifax multiplied many times, but without fire and cold and with less loss of life. The reports as to loss of life vary widely. Some say a few scores have been killed; others place the loss of life in the thousands. There is no doubt that thousands have been injured, and that many thousands are homeless, while food is scarce.

Guatemala City stands on a plain at an elevation of 4,850 feet above sea level. The first Guatemala City, founded in 1522, was destroyed in 1541, with a loss of 8,000 inhabitants killed, by a deluge of water from a nearby volcano which was rent by an earthquake. The rebuilt capital was again destroyed by an earthquake in 1773. As a result of this experience, the majority of the buildings in the city were low structures, which probably accounts for the small loss of life in the present disaster.

Contributions for the relief of Guatemala City in its distress and need will be received by the Christian Herald and will be duly acknowledged and forwarded.

Missionaries Appeal for Guatemala

THE following dispatch has been received by the Christian Herald from Guatemala City:

"December 31, 1917.
"Guatemala City destroyed by earthquake Christmas night. One hundred thousand people homeless, hungry and suffering. Missionary organizations appeal for $50,000 for immediate relief. Ten hospital tents, 50 beds each, needed; also 350 beds equipped, 4 operating tables, 6 wheeled stretchers, and a steam sterilizer. We need clothing, bedding, flour, rice, potatoes, lard. Rush help.
WM. B. ALLISON,
Presbyterian Board, Guatemala."

The Christian Herald, in response to this appeal, has cabled $1,000 for immediate relief and has arranged to forward to the missionaries any contributions received.

reinforcements time to reach their little number in the captured outpost. Maurice knew the alarm had been given by the Germans; he knew too there could not be many men in that outpost, to which now he was very close. His Flemish stubbornness asserted itself. "I will not go back," he said to himself; so alone he leaped into the trench and with a fiery valor, with the strength of ten men, he stopped not until he alone was left alive and seven of the enemy dead lay about him. Scarcely realizing all that he had achieved, but reeling and faint from loss of blood from the wounds that had been inflicted upon him, with his failing breath he called out for his comrades. Not far away he heard the welcome answer.

It was a mud-covered, blood-stained hero that was rescued from the trench and taken in the commandant's car to La Panne, and the aftermath was that a king presented to him, a common, simple Ostend sailor, the coveted distinction, the bearer of which even a general must salute.

But days of greater testing were to come to the Chevalier Bogaert, for he received from us a Bible and became a real apostle of the trenches. If a Bible was good for him, it was also good for his comrades, so he argued. He decided he would hold meetings and enlisted a friend to work with him. One would take the French-speaking boys, or Walloons, the other the Flemish; but not all their audience took kindly to this form of public evangelism. In the barracks back of the lines where he made his first attempt, he soon became the target for a shower of missiles. "Anything they could lay hands on they threw at us," he concluded to us later; but, it was not in him to give up his cause thus easily. "Never mind, Constant," he assured his friend, "the Lord will help us!" Thinking it over later, he decided it might be the part of wisdom to change his tactics a little, so he and Constant hit upon a plan. Instead of openly addressing the crowd, they got together two or three interested ones in a corner and conversed earnestly with them in a whisper. This proved too much for the curiosity of the others, and one by one they also drew near, and soon these evangelists of the trenches had another and this time a willing audience.

IT was a proud Maurice who later told us that, as a result of their work, practically every man of their company—of whom the greater part were infidels and freethinkers—had declared themselves Christians, and that they were to have a chaplain of their own on the strength of his work.

Maurice is now beginning to look ahead a bit, for in a letter he says, to quote him literally, "Now, mother, I think the war is on his end, and it is time to think of getting married, so I want you to look around and pick a good wife for me." I might add that this is a frequent request on the part of the Belgian soldier, and it takes a great exercise of diplomacy on my part to evade the issue. I remember writing Maurice that I could not act quickly in the matter, for it must be an exceptionally fine girl to be worthy of him, and I doubted whether a suitable one could be found outside of America.

But requests for wives are not the only ones that come to us. We have every sort of petition. Soldiers ask us for anything from hair tonic and books on hypnotism, to the gift of a farm on which to start life anew after the war. One man asks for a razor, which he is careful to explain is "necessary for the beard," and when the requests must be refused, always the soldiers take it in good part.

A sunny lad was our "little son Jean," as he styled himself, but "Sergeant Smolders" to his men at the front.

A chance meeting in London, and he became "your little son Jean who loves and adores you as though you were really his own mother." Who could resist a devotion like that! "You should have seen him later," his comrade told me. "When he first began to write you from the front, he had not a great deal of schooling; so he would first of all make a rough draft of his letter to you, then bring it over to me to see if it were correct and afterward, most painstakingly, he would copy it out." Three or four times a week his letters arrived, until we came regularly to expect them.

It was a happy day for Jean when we were accorded a visit to the Belgian front. "Our boys" had been written that we would be there at such a time, and as many as could do so obtained permission from their commanding officers to pay us a visit of a day or so in our little hotel, just back of the lines. We had a permanently enlarged table, and, although the hotel was frequented solely by officers, yet our boys, as they came to visit us, were accorded every consideration by the officers themselves. Thus it befell that when our table ran out of bread, as it was constantly doing—for you should have seen the mountains of delectable Belgian bread melt away under the onslaughts of those hungry boys, to whom the sour "Joffre bread," as they called it, had become worse than monotonous—one of these officers would leave his place and supply our need from his own table.

JEAN was an early arrival, with two days to stay, as he proudly informed us, showing his permission, which we smiled to see, read, "Jean Smolders. Sergeant, is accorded permission to pass two days with his parents at La Panne."

It was a happy time we passed together, those two days.

Then came a morning when, as we were looking over our morning mail with its usual quota of the humorous and the pathetic, we found confronting us a letter with the seal of the commandant, telling us that Jean was dead.

Little Jean dead! Then I thought of his own words, "We must just take a little patience, mother." So we said to each other through our tears, "Yes, we too, will 'just take a little patience' 'until the morning breaketh and the shadows flee away'; and our Jean is with the Lord whom he loved, and that is 'far better.'"

Eat More Fish, Says Mr. Hoover!

America's Fisheries Can Produce Enough to Feed the World Even in War-Time—By FRANK G. CARPENTER

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

OUR present consumption of meat is about seventeen times as great as our consumption of fish, and every pound of fish we eat will release that much beef, mutton and pork for shipment abroad.

Herbert C. Hoover, the Food Administrator, is advising that every American add to the fish on his table. This is the advice also of Hugh M. Smith, the United States Fish Commissioner. Dr. Smith is our world authority on fish, and under him is a large corps of scientists who are always studying the possibilities of sea-food as a national asset. Their recent experiments show that fish meat will build up the body as well as beefsteak, and that men can replace all other meats with fish every day in the year without ill effects. They advise us to eat fresh fish if we are near the source of supply, and salt fish and smoked fish wherever we are. The Bureau of Fisheries in Washington, D. C., has a book of recipes for preparing salt fish and smoked fish for the table, and if you will write Dr. Smith he will send it to you. He will tell you also how to can fish and smoke it, and about other ways in which to put up your supply for the winter.

I WANT to tell you something about our fisheries as a national asset. The waters of the sea and land contain 19,000 different kinds of fishes, and those in and about the United States have so many varieties that you could start as a three-year-old baby and eat a new fish every day until you were old enough to have babies yourself, and not reach the end of the list. We are now producing more sea-food than any other country. The value of all the fish caught by man in one year is estimated at no less than $500,000,000. Of this our product is fully one-fifth. It is twice as large as that of Russia, ten times that of Germany and more than fifty times that of Austria-Hungary. It is about one-third again as big as that of Great Britain, which ranks second as a national fisherman, and the same is true of Japan, which catches $63,000,000 worth of fish every year. The sea-food of Germany has been cut down by the war.

The North Sea is one of the best fishing-grounds upon earth. During the year prior to the war it produced about 2,500,000,000 pounds of sea-food, so much that, if it were loaded on wagons, the fish train containing it would reach all the way from New York City to San Francisco, via Galveston, and back. The amount that Great Britain got from it was more than 1,000,000,000 pounds, and this meant twenty-two pounds of sea-food for every man, woman and child in that country.

THE North Sea supplied not only a great part of the fish for the British, but it was the main source of sea-food for Holland, Denmark, Belgium and France, and also for Switzerland and Germany, and other countries of interior Europe where the fish were sent smoked, salted or dried. Most of the fish eaten in Europe is salt fish, and a vast amount of such food will be consumed by the soldiers. The supply from the North Sea has been greatly reduced, and the food losses there will have to be replaced by fish and meat shipped in from other parts of the world.

Our own waters are so rich in sea-food that we could multiply our product a hundredfold. We have not only the United States proper, but we have our colonial possessions, about which are fisheries now producing $15,000,000 worth of sea-food every year.

One of the fishes in which there is bound to be a great shortage in Europe is the herring. This forms a large part of the catch of the North Sea, amounting in some years to about three billion fish weighing on the average about one-half pound apiece. We have vast schools of herring in the northern Atlantic and they swarm in the waters of Alaska. They are dried and smoked in vast numbers.

We have one kind of herring which is so abundant that we catch more than 1,000,000,000 of them every year. This is the menhaden, a palatable food fish, so abundant that our fishermen catch it in order than $70,000,000. In addition to this an enormous amount of salmon has been salted or smoked. This also can be shipped abroad for the use of our allies. The same is true of halibut, herring and cod.

The coast of Alaska swarms with fish, and we have caught so many since we bought the territory of Russia that the amount received is forty times as much as we paid for the country. It is now close to $300,000,000. Four-fifths of our halibut comes from the Pacific Ocean and the bulk of it from the waters of Alaska. They are shipped over the United States by fast trains of cold storage cars. Some of the halibut is salted and put up in hogsheads for shipment abroad. The Germans have been laying in a stock of such fish for their army.

ANOTHER fish from Alaska which could easily be shipped as food for our allies is the cod. There are great banks about the Aleutian Islands, where the cod swarms as thickly as it once did on the banks of Newfoundland. We are now catching millions of pounds of Alaskan codfish every year, and the amount is steadily increasing. We take a great deal from the waters of the Atlantic and we are planting cod eggs and codfish in those waters to increase the supply. About ten years ago more than 100,000,000 little cod were planted by the United States Bureau of Fisheries during one season. The cod is prolific. Ten million eggs have been taken from a single female, weighing seventy-five pounds.

The cod is more popular in Europe than here. It is greatly relished by the French, Italians and Spaniards.

In connection with the planting of codfish and cod eggs it will surprise some to know that Uncle Sam now hatches fish as farmers hatch chickens, and that he plants the young where he pleases. In the year before it broke out he planted three or four billion eggs or tiny fish and turned loose in the waters twenty million fingerlings, yearlings and adult fish of different varieties.

THE Bureau of Fisheries has now thirty-four permanent hatcheries, and more than one hundred sub-hatcheries and egg-collecting stations located in thirty-one different states and in Alaska. It has a floating hatchery in the steamer Fish Hawk. The Alaskan hatcheries distribute great quantities of salmon in the rivers and streams where that fish swarms, and they are planting shad eggs in similar places along our Eastern seaboard. They are planting whitefish in the Great Lakes and are setting out oyster beds where the oyster has never grown in abundance before.

The bureau is planting fish not only in the waters along our coast, but in those of our streams, lakes and ponds. You have all heard of the carp. That is an alien German subject which has been introduced in our American ponds since his first coming in 1877. He has grown rapidly and, according to our last fish census, gives us more than 43,000,000 pounds of food a year.

There are now millions of carp in the United States, and the number might easily be run high into the billions. If one American farmer in six should start a carp pond the interior of our country would have more of this food than it could possibly eat.

Some may object to the taste of the carp, but that is because they do not know how to cook it.

If a carp is cooked the right way it is hard to distinguish it from some of our choicest sea-food. In protein food values carp meat is equal to mutton, and almost to the best of sirloin steak. The Bureau of Fisheries can give you simple recipes how to fry, boil and bake it, and how to make carp pickles, carp salads and carp croquettes.

A choice catch of Alaskan halibut, the source of four-fifths of our supply of this fish that it may be turned into oil and fertilizer. The fish is almost as fat as the famous candlefish of Alaska, which when dry will burn like a candle. We have more fishermen catching menhaden than in any other branch of the industry. The fish are taken in seines, hundreds of thousands being sometimes pulled up in a single net. They swim about in immense schools, their heads close to the surface, and often tier above tier, packed almost as closely together as sardines in a box. They are of a bright silver, and are phosphorescent at night, so that a school then looks like a moving bed of flaming fire. As they swim below the surface in the daytime one may see their glittering backs down under the water, and the boats seem to be gliding over a floor inlaid with blocks of silver. This statement comes from one of the reports of the Bureau of Fisheries.

Our best fishing-grounds in proportion to the number of men employed are the waters of Alaska. We have 22,000 men there who are catching hundreds of millions of pounds of sea-food every year. We have 14,000 fishermen farther south in the Pacific Ocean and about 20,000 in the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River. We have 22,000 fishermen in New England, 15,000 along the Gulf of Mexico and more than 70,000 working along the Atlantic coast from New England to Florida. Altogether there is an army of 165,000 engaged in fishing as a business, and the capital invested is nearly $80,000,000. The number of vessels employed is more than 7,000 and the total catch runs into hundreds of millions of pounds.

Our most important fisheries just now are those of Alaska, Puget Sound and the Columbia River. This is on account of the salmon, which is put up in cans so that it can easily be shipped to the soldiers. Salmon has become a popular sea-food all over the world. It is known to every nation and eaten in every country. Last year we took out of the Pacific Ocean enough salmon to fill 6,000,000 cases, each holding forty-eight one-pound cans. In round numbers the amount was 300,000,000 pounds. It was worth more

Coal and Cold

NEW York City and the whole of New England was held from the night of December 29 until January 3 in the grip of the worst cold spell known since the establishment of the Weather Bureau. In 1871, on the night of December 29, the official thermometer at New York City showed 6 degrees below zero, which was the previous low record, having been reached four times between 1871 and 1917. But on the night of December 30, the mercury sank to 13 degrees below; not only establishing a new record, but, coming as it did on top of an acute shortage of fuel, bringing in its train misery and suffering. On December 29 New York City as a whole had less than a day's supply of coal at the terminals and in stock.

The cold filled the Hudson and the East River with floating ice, froze up the approaches to slips and piers, and made the coal in the cars at the terminals one solid mass.

Secretary McAdoo, as Director General of the railroads, Mayor-elect Hylan of New York, the local and national Fuel Administrations, the Shipping Board and the railroad executives collaborated in efforts to rush fuel to New York City and to equally frozen New England. Secretary McAdoo gave coal precedence over other freight, and ordered 1,500 loaded cars, which had been delayed in transit, to be forwarded by the shortest route to the New England consignees. The Shipping Board ordered steamships with a capacity of 50,000 tons to proceed immediately to Hampton Roads to take on coal for New England, and the Navy Department ordered all idle tugs and colliers into the same service, and authorized commanders to distribute to the poor scraps of timber accumulated at the navy yards. Mr. McAdoo ordered one hundred carloads of coal to be rushed through the Pennsylvania tubes on the night of December 31, and he ordered continued use of the tubes for coal on each night thereafter. The franchise under which the tubes were built permitted only passenger traffic, but the city waived this provision of the franchise. This was only a part, however, of what the city did. Its docks were thrown open to coal barges, city tugs broke the accumulated ice around piers and slips and took their turn at towing the precious barge-loads of the much-needed fuel. City ashearts returned from the piers with loads of coal, and every city employee who could be usefully employed at the work was given a part in the effort to bring comfort to chilled homes.

Here and there a person more fortunate than the rest, whose bin was full, shared with his less fortunate neighbors. One hundred pounds of coal was a prize, and even a scuttful was not to be disdained. Thousands of children staid in bed with all their clothes on to keep warm, yet in one East Side home a baby froze to death in his crib. In hundreds of offices employees worked in their wraps and climbed with weary steps long flights of stairs because there was no coal to furnish power for elevators. All useless lights were ordered out, and advertising signs of every kind were extinguished for six nights a week.

Following the holidays, seventy-five of New York's schools failed to open for lack of coal, most of these schools being in Brooklyn and Queens.

The situation at the railway terminals in Jersey was further complicated by the freezing up of the Jersey City water supply, which practically put out of action the great railway terminals. On January 3, however, the various boroughs were beginning to have a sufficient supply, the temperature was slowly rising and the most acute period of suffering had been passed. Over a dozen deaths from freezing were reported during the six days. The freezing of water supply and the fuel shortage from which the railroads suffered as well as other industries, resulted in a serious congestion of mail in New York, which caused the New York Post adequate compensation, just alike to the owners and to the general public. Immediately following the conclusion of the address, bills prepared by the Department of Justice and the Interstate Commerce Commission were introduced into both Houses of Congress. The bills provide for compensation as suggested by the President, provide for a reserve fund, and provide also that any surplus revenue from the operation of the railroads, over and above the guarantee, shall accrue to the national treasury. The final section of the bill provides that Federal control shall man of the Santa Fe Directorate, was made assistant to the Director General, and Alfred H. Smith, president of the New York Central, was placed in charge of transportation in the Eastern and Northern districts. All traffic agreements between companies which operated to interfere with the quick movement of freight, were cancelled by Mr. McAdoo, who ordered the establishment of new through routes over shortest lines. The railroads were told to bend every effort to the movement of freight, and a survey of the country was ordered to see how many locomotives and cars might be released in the West and South for service in the North and East. In the interest of better freight movement eastern railroads, notably the Reading, Pennsylvania, Baltimore & Ohio, and New Haven, cancelled many passenger trains, new schedules providing for alternate service on former competing lines. Director General of Railroads McAdoo on January 3 conferred with the heads of the big railroad brotherhoods and urged them as a patriotic duty to urge the workers, whose chosen leaders they were, to their utmost efforts to meet the traffic requirements of the national situation. As a result of the conference it was announced that readjustments in wages would be made effective January 1, 1918, and that the unions would work with the Director General to obtain the maximum efficiency of the railroads under government control.

PROFITABLE SERVICE. Testimony before the Senate Military Affairs Committee indicated that some members of the Supplies Committee of the Council of National Defense had not used their influence, as government agents, to prevent the awarding of government contracts to concerns in which they were interested. It was shown that the vice-chairman of the Supply Committee, Charles Eiseman, was a stockholder in the Cleveland Worsted Mills, which held contracts for 100,000 yards of all woolen suitings at a price above that paid to other concerns for similar goods, the excess netting a profit of about $30,000. Mr. Eiseman testified that deliveries of goods had been kept ahead of the demands of the Quartermaster's Department.

COLONEL HOUSE REPORTS. Secretary Lansing made public on January 2 a confidential report from Colonel House covering the work of the special war mission of which he was the head. The report shows that complete unity of action was obtained in all military matters on land and sea, all of the forces of the nations allied with us in the war being welded together into a workable unit for aggressive action, that agreements had provided that imports into Allied countries would be further restricted to absolute necessities, thus releasing transports for American troops, which will be rushed to Europe and supplied by our Allies until American manufacture catches up with American needs. General Crozier, however, has stated that there will be rifles for every American soldier by February 1. It was reported that a complete understanding had been reached regarding the extent of American participation in the war, and that every possible arrangement had been made to make this participation effective. American pressure for the present will be placed upon the supply of men and ships.

Lloyd George Restates War Aims

ADDRESSING the Trade Union Conference on Man Power in London on January 5, Mr. David Lloyd George stated again, the war aims of the Entente.

The address, as officially reported, was in part as follows:

"When men by the million are being called upon to suffer and die, and vast populations are being subjected to sufferings and privations of war on a scale unprecedented in the history of the world, they are entitled to know for what cause or causes they are making the sacrifice. . . .

"We are not fighting a war of aggression against the German people. . . . The destruction or disruption of Germany or the German people has never been a war aim with us from the first day of this war to this day.

"Most reluctantly, and, indeed, quite unprepared for the dreadful ordeal, we were forced to join in this war in self-defense of the violated public law of Europe and in vindication of the most solemn treaty obligations on which the public system of Europe rested, and on which Germany had ruthlessly trampled in her violation of Belgium. . . .

"It is not our wish or intention to question or destroy Germany's position for the future, but rather to turn her aside from hopes and schemes of military domination. . . .

"Our point of view is that the adoption of a really democratic constitution by Germany would be the most convincing evidence that her old spirit of military domination has indeed died in this war, and would make it much easier for us to conclude a broad, democratic peace with her. But, after all, that is a question for the German people to decide.

"We are not fighting to destroy Austria-Hungary or to deprive Turkey of its capital or the rich lands of Asia Minor and Thrace which are predominantly Turkish. . . .

The speaker here repeated the main statement of Count von Czernin's recent peace offer and said that almost any scheme of conquest and annexation could be perpetrated under such a pledge. Then he went on:

"The settlement of the new Europe must be based on such ground of reason and justice as will give some promise of stability. Therefore it is that we feel that government with the consent of the governed must be the basis of any international settlement in this war. . . .

"The first requirement, therefore, always put forward by the British Government and their Allies has been the complete restoration, political, territorial and economic, of the independence of Belgium, and such reparation as can be made for the devastation of its towns and provinces.

"Next comes the restoration of Serbia, Montenegro and the occupied parts of France, Italy and Rumania. . . .

"We mean to stand by the French democracy in the demand they make for the reconsideration of the great wrong of 1871. . . .

"If the present rulers of Russia take action which is independent of their allies we have no means of intervening to arrest the catastrophe which is assuredly befalling their country. Russia can only be saved by her own people.

"We believe that an independent Poland, comprising all those genuinely Polish elements who desire to form a part of it, is an urgent necessity for the stability of Western Europe."

Declaring war a relic of barbarism, he said in closing:

"If, then, we are asked what we are fighting for, we reply, as we have often replied, We are fighting for a just and a lasting peace, and we believe that before permanent peace can be hoped for three conditions must be fulfilled: First, the sanctity of treaties must be reestablished; secondly, a territorial settlement must be secured, based on the right of self-determination or the consent of the governed; and, lastly, we must seek, by the creation of some international organization, to limit the burden of armaments and diminish the probability of war."

Office to refuse second class matter. Many magazines were delayed in delivery, as was much other mail.

Russia Refuses German Peace Terms

HALT, in the Russo-German peace negotiations and indications of a German refusal to move the conference to Stockholm have revived universal discussion in Petrograd of a resumption by Russia of fighting, although with a greatly reduced army, probably 3,000,000 men.

It was authoritatively announced on January 3 that the Russian workers would not consent to the Austro-German peace proposals in their present form. The German attitude regarding Poland, Lithuania and other occupied countries is the sticking point. The Russians demand that the Central Powers modify their terms, and the Russians make a direct appeal to the Austro-German peoples.

M. Trotzky, the Bolshevik Foreign Minister, in making this announcement before the Workers' and Soldiers' delegates, declared that if the Central Powers did not agree to free disposal of the destiny of the Polish and Lettish nations, it would be urgently necessary to defend the Russian revolution. He said the needs of the front would be satisfied, whatever efforts might be necessary.

Chairman Jaffe, of the Russian Peace Delegation, sent an official telegram to the chairmen of the German, Austrian, Bulgarian and Turkish delegations, saying the Russian Republic deems it necessary to conduct further peace negotiations on neutral soil. Articles 1 and 2 of the Austro-German terms, submitted December 25, the message says, are in direct conflict with the principles insisted upon by the Russian peace delegation and supported by the Russian Republic and the Central Executive Committee of the Congress of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Austro-German terms cover the ending of a state of war and the evacuation of occupied territory. In Article 2, however, it was declared that the people of Poland, Lithuania, Courland and portions of Esthonia and Livonia demand independence and separation from Russia, and that the German occupation of Russian territory did not apply to these districts.

THE following resolution—which is both Russia's refusal to accept the German peace proposals and the Revolutionary Government's appeal to the people of the Central Empires—was adopted by the Executive Committee of the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates:

"This assembly confirms the fact that the programme proclaimed by the representatives of the Quadruple Alliance at Brest-Litovsk recognizes in principle the conclusion of a peace without annexations or indemnities. This recognition establishes the basis for further negotiations, with the view of a general democratic peace.

"However, already in this declaration, the representatives of the German Government have refused to admit the free right of oppressed nations and colonies seized before the beginning of the war in 1914 to dispose of their own destiny. This restriction, which was immediately reported by the Russian delegation, signifies the dominant parties in Germany, compelled by a popular movement to grant concessions to the principles of a democratic peace, nevertheless are trying to distort this idea in the sense of their own annexationist policy.

"The Austro-German delegation, in setting forth the practical conditions of peace in the east, alters still further its idea of a just, democratic peace. This declaration is made in view of the fact that the Austrian and German Governments refused to guarantee immediately and irrevocably the removal of their troops from the occupied countries of Poland, Lithuania and Courland and parts of Livonia and Esthonia.

"In fact, the free affirmation of their will by the populations of Poland, Lithuania, Courland and all other countries occupied by the troops of other States is impossible until the moment of the return of the native population to the places they have evacuated. The allegation of the German delegation that the will of the people of the said countries has already been manifested is devoid of all foundation.

"Under martial law and under the yoke of the military censorship the peoples of the occupied countries could not express their will.

The Course of Gentile Empire

The Rise, Succession and Coming Doom of Gentile Nations as Foretold in Prophecy

By DR. WILLIAM M. SMITH, Superintendent, Union Bible Seminary, Westfield, Indiana

ABOUT twenty-five centuries ago a great Eastern monarch lay on his couch wondering what should come to pass hereafter. As he thought, he fell asleep and dreamed a remarkable dream. Before him stood a great image in human form. The head of this image was of gold, the breast and arms of silver, the abdomen of brass, and the legs of iron. The feet were composed partly of iron and partly of pottery.

The dreamer was Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon; and the dream, when interpreted by the prophet Daniel, constitutes the primary lesson in Bible prophecy predictive of the course of history. The dream and its interpretation are both recorded in the second chapter of the book of Daniel.

The vision of the image in its entirety sets forth the course of history during the period of the political supremacy of the Gentile nations, a period that had a distinct beginning, and will have a no less distinct ending. This period is designated in the New Testament as "the times of the Gentiles" (Luke 21:24).

Nebuchadnezzar was the first Gentile king that succeeded in welding into one kingdom all the Gentile powers of the world. Though himself unconscious of the fact, he was God's agent for that very work, as is plainly shown in the twenty-seventh chapter of Jeremiah's prophecy, where the nations, including the Jews, are commanded to bring their necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon. With the passing under Babylonian rule of Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, the scepter of world power passed from the Jewish nation, who, if obedient, might have been the rulers of the world, into the hands of the Gentiles, who have been world rulers from that day to this. But the Gentile supremacy, which began with God's express decree, will as surely end; for he has decreed it, as we shall later see.

IT is comparatively easy for the reader of history to trace the fulfilment of the predictions pictured by this image, up to a certain point. The golden head is plainly the Babylonian kingdom from its conquest of the kingdom of Judah to its own downfall under the Medo-Persian advance in the days of Belshazzar. "Thou art this head of gold," is the prophet's interpretation, meaning not only Nebuchadnezzar himself but also his kingdom. "After thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee" as plainly refers to Medo-Persia, the next Gentile power to hold supreme world-rule. "Another third kingdom of brass" as surely describes Greece, the conqueror and successor of Medo-Persia; and the "fourth kingdom" is Rome in the period of its supremacy as ruler over the civilized world.

Practically all students of prophecy, regardless of their denominational beliefs or varying notions on other points of Bible teaching, interpret the meaning of the image thus far as it is given above.

One thing that has puzzled Bible students in the interpretation of this prophecy is why, after so simple and plain an application of its predictions to succeeding history, that part of the vision regarding the "toes of the feet" and the "stone" should not as plainly find its fulfilment in history. The attempt has been made to deal with this difficulty by spiritualizing the application of the prophecy from the time of Christ onward. Whatever may be claimed for the legitimacy of such interpretation, which is applied to much other Old Testament prophecy, it cannot claim to completely fulfil the predictions, which evidently still await historic fulfilment after the same manner as the other part of the image.

This puzzle is due to the failure of many Bible students to take into consideration the "mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men" (Eph. 3: 4, 5). This mystery occupies the period devoted to the preaching of the Gospel to all nations and the consequent taking out from among all peoples of the Church. While this process is going on Old Testament prophecy, as it relates to the course of history, is held in abeyance, awaiting the completion of this mystery. When this mystery is finished, then history will take up the thread of Old Testament prophecy and carry it on to its literal fulfilment.

THE last phase of Gentile rule, as set forth in this image, is that of the civilized world ruled by ten federated kings. The attempts that have been made to find the fulfilment of this part of the prophecy in the kingdoms into which the Roman Empire divided have been very unsatisfactory and exceedingly hazy as compared with the fulfilment of the previous parts of the prophecy. The expositors on this line do not succeed in getting their lists to agree with each other, nor can these kingdoms be confined to ten, and ten only, all the time of their supposed existence.

There has been one theory held quite generally by all schools of prophetic interpretation, and that is that these ten kingdoms will be geographically limited to the territory occupied by the Roman Empire in the days of its supremacy. The writer is not ready wholly to discard this theory, but suggests that, since Rome was not geographically confined to the territory of the kingdoms that preceded it, this last phase of Gentile rule may not be confined to the territory of the Rome of history. These former kingdoms, including Rome, ruled over the civilized world, and, since the civilized world now covers much more territory than the Rome of the first century, it is quite possible the rule of this tenfold Gentile power may be accordingly extended to the increased territorial expansion of civilization.

THE Gentile rule will come to a tragic end, as pictured in the vision. A stone, evidently foreign in its origin, and different in its composition from anything in the image, strikes the image on its feet, and then, in one sudden cataclysm, the whole image, picturing the course of Gentile world-rule, collapses, is ground to dust and blown away, never more to find a place.

The application of this striking stone to the coming of Christ recorded in the Gospels is hopelessly to confuse literal with spiritual. That coming of Christ was when the Roman Empire was but thirty-one years old as the supreme world power. The stone is expressly declared to strike the feet, which evidently points to a much later time. The destruction of the governments of this world as a result of Christ's first coming have been exceedingly moderate, to say the least; quite different from the way a stone smites things. It was not to be in the day of one supreme world monarch like Caesar, but "in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom," evidently referring to the time when the world would be ruled by ten kings, symbolized by the ten toes of the image.

IT is evident, from what has already been said, that the period of mystery referred to above must end before the next stage of Gentile supremacy is plainly manifest in history. While the Scriptures warrant the setting of no date as to when the mystery will be finished, they plainly declare certain signs by which the approaching close may be discerned as near. Without stopping to refer in detail to these signs, let us take one general view of present-day world events in the light of both prophecy and history.

We are now in the midst of a world war surpassing in extent and violence anything found in the records of history for many centuries. But, while modern methods and machinery of warfare give to the present struggle features that set it in a class by itself, it is not by any means the first world war. Here is a suggestion: let us take world wars as epoch-marking events and see what can be inferred from the present world situation. A little study will show that world wars have marked the epochs of history into plainly discernible periods. For instance, the period of Gentile supremacy symbolized by this image was inaugurated in a world war. The suggestion will immediately follow that the period of Gentile supremacy will end with a world war. This inference is probably correct. But we have not yet reached the end. There is one more period of Gentile rule to manifest itself before the end. How will it be inaugurated?

Another look at the image in the light of history will bring the suggestion that the change from each form of Gentile rule to the next has been marked by a world war. When Babylon was succeeded by Medo-Persia it was the climax of a world war. Greece succeeded Medo-Persia as a world-wide kingdom as a result of a world war. Rome brought in her iron rule at the end of a long-drawn-out world war with the dismembered Grecian kingdom. There has been no world war since that, involving the entire civilized world, until the one now raging, which already so nearly involves directly all civilized nations. The suggestion, though offered cautiously, is that the present world war, be its course long or short, will eventuate in the bringing into existence of the last phase of Gentile world rule, the kingdom of the ten toes: the dream of poets, the goal of world politicians, a federated world.

In this federated world the Gentiles will bring to a climax their boasted schemes of world improvement. The iron, symbolical of the rule of autocracy, will mingle with the clay, symbol of the common people, in the attempt to make the world a Utopia in which every man will have his rights. But, alas! the prophet tells us, "they shall not cleave one to the other," and it will be "in the days of these kings" that the event symbolized by the striking of the stone will take place. Christ will personally come, doubtless to find the Gentile world in confusion within itself, as other prophecies indicate, and determined upon the extermination of the Jewish remnant, restored to their land. Upon this demonstration of Gentile maladministration the Lord will break in to the overthrow of the Gentile powers, the relief of the elect nation, and the setting up of the kingdom that will never be destroyed. This last overthrow will be the Armageddon of the prophecies.

Partnership With Jesus

TEXT—Col. 1:14, "In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins."

SIN is authoritatively defined as "any want of conformity unto, or transgression of, the law of God." Law, as it concerns moral beings, is a rule of conduct enforced by penalty. Law, therefore, is composed of two elements: precept and penalty. Precept tells what to do, and penalty tells the consequence of not doing. Subtract either element from law, and it ceases to be law. Forgiveness is a remission of the penalty due the sinner for non-conformity to, or transgression of, law.

Every human being needs forgiveness, for (Rom. 3:23) "All have sinned." All have failed of perfect obedience; "all have gone out of the way" (Rom. 3:12), i.e., all have transgressed.

In every just law—which every law of God is—both of the elements of law are right. If I break the preceptive part of the law, equity declares it to be right and just that I should suffer the penalty, or forgive, and not thereby himself do wrong?

But a serious ethical question arises just here. If forgiveness be the remission of penalty, the question inevitably presents itself. How, or on what ethical ground, can God remit the penalty, or forgive, and not thereby himself do wrong?

A satisfactory rational answer to this problem is thought to present one of the greatest difficulties with which the Biblical and theological discipline has to deal. Indeed, many have given it up as unsolvable, and have taken the doctrine of forgiveness as simply resting on the authority of divine revelation. Let us see.

My moral sense, in common with that of others, tells me that I ought to suffer the penalty of my sin; that it is eternally right that I should suffer it, and eternally wrong that I should not. It demands that the penalty incurred must be suffered. So, whatever answer is given to meet the question, it must certainly include the penalty satisfied; for, if the penalty be not endured, the righteous penal element of the law is violated, and still another—and, if possible, worse—sin is committed.

THE Bible proclaims the fullest and freest forgiveness. When, therefore, God forgives a person, it can be only on the ground that the penalty of his individual sin has been met. But how? The ready answer is, Through the redemptive work of the Lord Jesus Christ! "In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins." (I Peter 3:18) "Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for [Gr. hyper, 'instead of'] the unjust"; for substitution is implied. (I Thess. 5:10) "Christ died for [hyper, 'instead of'] us," or in our stead. And these texts are only samples of much Scripture of similar import. The teaching plainly is that Christ came into the place of the sinner and suffered the penalty which was due to his sins.

But it may be said: "The fact of Christ's substitution is plain enough, but the difficulty is not resolved; for"—and this is the real crux of the question—"how can an innocent person justly suffer the penalty which another and guilty person deserves? What is the rationally ethical ground, or basis of right, of the transaction?"

Let it be supposed that you have sufficient capital, and that I have none, and that affluent you take penitence me into business partnership with you. In the eye of the law, and for all the purposes of the business, we are as one person. Your business acts are the acts of the firm; so are mine. In our business I incur an obligation—give a check, for instance. Your money, or, as I may now say, our money, pays it. I commit a business sin: the firm stands for it. My iniquities may pile up to the full measure of the firm's ability to cover them; but it has to cover them all the same. The principle is plain: the acts of one are the acts of the firm, and the liabilities of one are the liabilities of the firm. From any ethical point of view no fault can be found with it. There is nothing of business wrong or injustice in it. Moral sense pronounces it right.

Now, this partnership idea is precisely the New Testament idea of the relation between Jesus Christ and the believer!

Says Holy Writ: "Ye were called into the fellowship of Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 1:9). The word translated "fellowship," koinonia, means "to have things in common," or in "partnership." Again, "ye are partakers (in partnership with) of Christ" (I Pet. 4:13). Still again: "And truly our fellowship [same word again that means 'to have in common' or 'in partnership'] is with Jesus Christ" (I John 1:3). And these partnership words are used in the New Testament, in various relations, thirty-nine times.

Thus, getting at the interior and real meaning of these terms, we clearly see the great and glorious fact of our partnership with the Lord Jesus Christ, or of his partnership with us, in which he assumes our liabilities and discharges them. And not only does he bear our liabilities while one with us, but—that the union may be solid and spotless, that no breath of ill-aspiration may tarnish its good name—he assumes all the liabilities we incurred before we entered into the partnership. Such becomes our oneness with him, we are told (I John 4:17), that "As he is, so are we in this world."

Is our moral sense satisfied with the rightfulness of the common, familiar, and everywhere-accepted principle of the business partnership? On precisely the same ground it should be satisfied with the rightfulness of the believer's moral and religious partnership with Jesus Christ, in which sin is forgiven. And this partnership with all that it means to us, is the free gift of divine grace to the sinner who relents and accepts Christ as Saviour and Redeemer. Through it God can rightfully forgive sin, and be just while justifying the sinner that believeth in Jesus.

THE way is now open for us to consider, with receptive minds and appropriating hearts, God's treatment of sin. The Scriptures are very explicit and full in their teaching concerning the believer's sins and God's treatment of them. They are:

1. Confessed:—(Ps. 32:5,) "I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." (I John 1:9,) "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins."

2. Cleansed white:—(Isa. 1:18,) "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

3. Forgiven:—(Eph. 4:32,) "God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you." (I John 2:12,) "Your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake."

4. Abundantly pardoned:—(Isa. 55:7,) "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." (Micah 7:18,) "Who is a God like unto thee that pardoneth iniquity? . . . He delighteth in mercy."

5. Covered:—(Ps. 32:1,) "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." (Ps. 85:2,) "Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people, thou hast covered all their sin."

6. Cast behind God's back:—(Isa. 38:17,) "For thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back."

7. Removed:—(Ps. 103:12,) "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us."

8. Cast into the sea:—(Micah 7:19,) "Thou wilt cast their sins into the depths of the sea."

9. Blotted out:—(Isa. 44:22,) "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins."

SYMPATHY

"THE load is heavy I must bear,"
He groaned as, sad at heart,
He walked his chosen selfish way,
From other men apart.

"How light the burden that He gives!"
She whispered as she trod
The road of life in sympathy
With other souls of God.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

10. Not to be mentioned:—(Ezek. 33:16,) "None of the sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him."

11. Forgotten:—(Heb. 10:17,) "And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more." (Isa. 43:25,) "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions, for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins."

WHILE all this is true, most blessedly true, concerning the believer's sins with respect to God, how is it with respect to the believer himself?

Alas! man cannot forgive himself! David could sing of the blessedness of forgiveness (Ps. 32:1), yet he says, "My sin is ever before me" (Ps. 52:3). His sin was forgiven, blotted out, remembered no more; of God; but it was not erased from his own mind.

The eminent Dr. John Todd, of Pittsfield, when a little lad, was bidden to go for some medicine for his sick father. Unwillingly he started, but quickly returned with the lie that "the druggist had not got any such medicine." The father suffered greatly for the want of the remedy, and soon died. Dr. Todd, through all his after life, often had a heartache over that act of falsehood and disobedience to his dying father. Repentance secured God's forgiveness; but he could not cast out his sin from his own consciousness.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, the great lexicographer, when a boy, was asked by his sick father to carry a package of books to the village of Uttoxeter, and sell them from a stall in the market-place. Through silly pride, the boy refused to obey. Fifty years afterward, when at the height of his fame as one of the most distinguished scholars of his day, he went to Uttoxeter, visited the market-place at the time of business, and with uncovered head stood for an hour in a pouring rain on the very spot where the book-stall stood. "This," he says, "was an act of contrition for my disobedience to my kind father." And this touching scene is represented in marble on his monument. If penitence procured pardon, it could not expel the haunting memory of his sin.

There is a tradition that never, all his life long, did the remembrance of his denial of Jesus leave Peter, and that, morning by morning, he rose at the very hour when the look of the Master broke his heart, to pray once more for pardon. He was abundantly pardoned at the outset; but the mordant memory of his sin was ceaselessly with him.

In the "Life of Phillips Brooks," there is an account of an extraordinary sermon he delivered at Harvard from the text, "Thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth." An able minister wrote upon the margin of his copy, "We never get rid of any act: it is a part of ourselves." The problem of psychology is, not how we can remember, but how we can ever forget anything. Apparently none of the mind's acquisitions are ever lost. According to the old illustration, the lad's sins drove the nails into the post; penitence pulled them out again; but the holes, the sad memorials of his wrongs, remained!

O YE sons and daughters, be careful. Yield not to temptation; go not into ways of sin, lest ye lay up for yourselves an inheritance of haunting memories that will embitter even the peace which God's forgiving grace procures, proffers and imparts.

O ye super-sensitive, morbid-conscience souls, hating sin with a perfect hatred, always repentant, yet well-nigh always troubled, or distressed, let the message of this hour of God's freest and fullest pardon for the uttermost of sin never cease to ring in the chambers of your consciousness: "The Lord is good, and ready to forgive, and plenteous in mercy unto all that call upon him." (Ps. 86:5.) Nothing that you can do of work or sacrifice can earn forgiveness. It has been bought with a great price, the precious blood of Christ. It is presented as a free gift, and as such it must be accepted. In Dr. Ludlow's "Captain of the Janizaries" it is wisely said: "Beware lest thou carry compunctions for the past, after thou hast repented and prayed. . . . That is to doubt God's grace." Said Dr. Watkinson at Winona: "If God doesn't remember my sins any more, I will not remember them myself against myself." So do, and be at peace, perfect peace.

Sin is the awfullest thing in God's universe; pardon is the greatest need in God's universe; God's forgiveness is the blesseddest thing in his universe.

DAILY MEDITATION

Reverend
E. W. Caswell
and
Prof. W. H. T. Dau

The Great Promise

SUNDAY, January 20. II Peter 1:4. "Exceeding great and precious promises." All the great saints have been souls who were keen on the great promises. On the most troubled and stormy roads, when they were pitilessly beaten by the elements, they have opened the divine promises, and the apparently shut-in road has become related to marvelous vistas and visions of grace. Look at Bishop Hannington, when he was imprisoned in darkness and distresses: "I am quite broken down and brought low. Comforted by reading the twenty-seventh Psalm." Or look at him again in his prison, at night-time, with the hyenas howling around: "I can hear no news, but was held up by the thirtieth Psalm, which came with great power."

Look at James Gilmour in Mongolia. He was a man who knew heavy roads, and he was certainly acquainted with disappointment and grief. "May 9. In terrible darkness and tears." But he turned to the great promises and found life and light. And he was a great heart, always leading troubled fellow laborers to the Dayspring. "Ask it, man, and you'll get it. God's promises are sure. I am trying to combine the China Inland Mission, the Salvation Army, and the London Missionary Society!" These great burdened servants of God turned to their resources in grace, gazing through the promises as through windows that looked out upon an amazing world.

It would be a blessed thing if, in these days of calamity, we carried the great promises about with us. Let us gather them together in our minds and hearts, and bear them in all our journeyings. Let us repeat them every day. Let us say or sing them on the lonely road. And we shall be amazed what ministries they will bring to us. Let us tuck one in when we are inclined to murmur or to bitterly recount our complaints. It will be like carrying a wallet full of balms and cordials, with which we can minister to our own disquietude, or bring hope and courage to some fretful pilgrim who may pass us on the way.

The Love of Mercy

MONDAY, January 21. Micah 6:8. "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" The highwater mark of Old Testament spirituality is reached in this verse. The love of mercy is entirely consonant with a passion for justice. Indeed, only one who loves mercy can be just without being severe. We are never just to those we do not love. If we are in danger of being over-merciful to those we love, it is only true in the same sense in which it is true that every virtue has its possible peril. The love of mercy does not impair the verdict of moral judgment as to what is right. One may love his child the while he imposes discipline. The child may not believe that discipline can proceed from a merciful heart, but when he becomes a man it will be very evident. There is an old Roman saying, that if we would be like God we must be like him in being merciful. A beautiful old story sets forth the relation of mercy, justice and truth. Thus it runs: Before God made man he called into his counsel his three great angels, Justice, Truth and Mercy, and said to them, "Shall I make man?" Said Justice, "Not so, for he will break thy laws." Said Truth, "Make not man, for he will pollute thy sanctuaries." But Mercy said, "Make man, and I will follow his footsteps and soften and purify his heart." So God made man, and said to him, "Mercy is thy shield and hope; be merciful to thy fellow man."

Fortune in Misfortune

TUESDAY, January 22. Ps. 119:71. "It is good for me that I have been afflicted." When Anthony Thorold published his "Presence of Christ" he stated in the preface: "In sending it out to the world the writer feels to be parting from a dear and pleasant friend, who has solaced tedious months of sickness and inactivity now in God's great goodness over. Those months will hardly have been endured for nothing if some of the lessons learned in them and written here shall be of some avail in comforting and instructing others." This statement is but one of thousands of similar import, all of them practical commentaries on this text, in which David thanks God for afflictions, as Paul gloried in his tribulations.

If a boy were told how many hardships he would have to endure, how much self-denial he must practice, how often he would be disappointed in his eager hopes, how much pain he must suffer, before he would attain to manhood, and that all these seeming reverses would be the very means of making a man of him, he would most likely rebel against the prospect set before him and declare that all those things could only be against him; they would break him down, not build him up. Yet in the training school of divine grace we are made to learn misfortunes and then are taught that the very word contains our fortunes, as soon as we can drop the first syllable.

God proposes to crown, not the person who has spent his life in ease and pleasant delights, but the person who has endured hardness. He has arranged it so that food tastes best to a hungry person, and that rest is best relished after hard work. Every success is bought at the price of suffering. As regards our spiritual life, God must cast us into the furnace of affliction and purge the dross of our conceits and self-will from us, before the new man can come forth in us that is renewed after his likeness.

Jesus and Joseph

WEDNESDAY, January 23. Matt. 12:42. "Behold, a greater than Solomon is here." Our Lord, who often described himself under the similitudes of nature, as the Vine, the Bread, the Light, the Sower, and the Shepherd, also compared himself with some characters, like Solomon, but we must remember that Jesus had no peers, no human standing on a level with him. He, in lofty, solitary grandeur, is above all forever. Our comparison is, therefore, considered on the human side. Solomon in all the glory of his artificial riches was not even arrayed like one of Christ's beautiful lilies, while his inner character and life were infinitely below that of the Master.

Joseph and Jesus might better be contrasted; Joseph in Egypt was faithful to the God of his fathers, while Solomon worshiped the false gods of his wives. Joseph had a mission for Israel in Egypt; Jesus a mission for all the world. Joseph was sold by his brothers into slavery. Jesus was sent of the Father to lift a race out of darkness. Joseph found a prison golden steps to the throne of Egypt; Jesus found Calvary the way to universal empire. Joseph was sold for twenty pieces of silver; Jesus for thirty. Joseph maintained an unsullied soul; Jesus was without sin. Joseph saved Egypt from famine; Jesus was the Saviour of the world from sin. Joseph forgave his brothers; Jesus is the infinite Forgiver. Joseph looked toward Canaan for Israel and Jesus toward the heavenly Canaan for the family of God. Joseph refused the glories of the Egyptian Empire; Jesus refused Satan's offer for world empire. Joseph revealed himself to his brothers, saying, "I am Joseph," as Jesus said to Paul, "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest."

May we seek to be as near like Jesus as Joseph was.

A Word to the Tired Teacher

THURSDAY, January 24. Gal. 6:9. "But let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap if we faint not." There is no work so hard as teaching. The mind is not a blank page to be written upon. Not even a child's mind is that, but is more like an old palimpsest, a parchment which has been written upon beneath the surface, written upon and covered over; written upon and not wholly erased. You say to the boy in your class, "Be honest." But from some other source, a source which goes back a century, another voice is saying, "Be a rogue." You say to a youth with fiery temper, "Be generous, be magnanimous," and other voices are speaking to him saying, "Get even with your enemy; bury the hatchet if you have to for decency's sake, but keep your eye on the hammer!" There is an invisible ink which becomes visible only in the fire. In the fiery trials of life, how much invisible writing comes out!

It is ours as parents and teachers and pastors to make our words a part of that invisible writing which will sometime flash before the eye with a splendor past all reckoning and a power transcending all thought.

And we must not be weary in helping. How shall we avoid weariness in this respect except by the remembrance of the mercy of the Lord toward us? How often have we been forgiven? How often have we been restored? Has some poor soul to whom we gave a brother's hand staggered back to us empty as before? Let this thought give us patience in well-doing: it may be we are the only human friend he has, and the friendship of God must be mediated—interpreted—translated—through us.

Unison in Christ

FRIDAY, January 25. II Cor. 13:5. "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" The state of faith is here described as having Christ dwelling in us. The very first act of faith is represented in the Scriptures as receiving, appropriating Christ. The believer accepts Christ primarily as his Redeemer, who has atoned for his guilt. But he accepts at the same time the entire teaching of Christ and embodies that in his manner of living. Thus Paul declared concerning himself in another place: "The life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God." The believer's actions thus are manifestations of the indwelling Christ: the motives for these actions arise from the Christ-spirit in the believer, and the actions themselves serve the purposes of Christ. They are, like Christ's own acts, entirely unselfish. Accordingly, when Christians are found doing something which does not comport with their Christian profession, or when—as in the case of the apostle at Corinth—they fail to appreciate what other Christians are doing, it is pertinent to inquire whether they are still in a state of faith and grace.

Every Christian readily understands any other Christian and just as readily agrees and cooperates with him; for Christ, though dwelling in many persons that may differ in external matters, is never a divided Christ. The Christ in the heart of a Chinaman is the same Christ as that in the heart of his American missionary.

There are differences among Christians which do not disturb the peace and the healthy development of the church. But when the differences touch the Christian vitality, the Christ in us, when they affect the teaching of Christ, which must regulate all activities of all the different Christians in the world, it is necessary that a thorough self-examination be made.

Close to Christ

SATURDAY, January 26. Rom. 12:9. "Cleave to that which is good." "Cleave" is a most intense word. It means as the flesh cleaves to the bones of the body; so the Christian should cleave to the Christ, grow up with Him, a being of living goodness, in a vital, not a mechanical or artificial, union. Goodness is a growth, not an external addition to character. Kindness is a part of the new man in Christ Jesus, inseparable from noble manhood. Goodness is truth and love incarnate in the individual. Goodness is godliness, in which there is infinite gain to the person. Goodness is Christlikeness, for he ever sought out the sinful, the lowly and the troubled, going about to do them good. The goodness of Christ was willing to be wounded for the transgressors; so we should do good to those who despitely use us.

"What are the wounds in Thine hands?" "Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends." "Yes, even mine own familiar friend whom I trusted hath laid wait for me." Can we, like Christ, seek to overcome evil with good? Feed our hungry enemy, quench his thirst and seek his salvation?

How little we know the great struggle a false friend is making to be good; what appetites for greed and lust and ambition he is fighting against! If he asks for bread, shall we give him a stone? If he ask forgiveness, shall we pass by with a look of disdain? How contrary that would be to Christ's compassion for the multitude? Is it not well to review the goodness of our Lord often? Behold him where the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear and the dead are raised up! See him washing the feet of the disciples just before he is to wash the sins of the world away in his blood! Go thou and be like him in goodness; work among the lowest of the lost.

Hope and Expectation

IN spite of all the troubles which the Old Year heaped upon us by way of parting salutation, there is a song in our hearts—the song of hope which “springs eternal” and which tells of the gifts the New Year brings to counterbalance the hard knocks dealt by his predecessor. And hope’s uplifting strain keeps ever tuning up to a higher key. We know that He who overrides all things will not permit the burden to be heavier than can be borne, and we know, also, that he will carry the heavier end of it if we trust him.

Yes, the Old Year did deal out some pretty stiff knocks in those last days; but the New came in with both hands filled with gifts that made him doubly welcome. He swept aside the cold wave, and brought assurance of a speedy end of the coal famine, through energetic and sensible methods of transportation and distribution—an inspiration which was quickly caught by Director-General McAdoo and his co-workers in the Fuel Administration. What a simple thing it seemed to go straight to the heart of the problem, by using the Pennsylvania Tubes to carry coal for the relief of the frigid metropolis!

And the New Year brings many other blessings, some of them already here, others on the way. As the weeks pass, the sacrifices and privations we are loyally facing as a nation, for a great and high purpose, will continue until that purpose is accomplished; but we now have the satisfaction of knowing that no longer can the greedy and unscrupulous speculators, the grasping profiteers, or the rich and powerful combinations make shameful gains out of the necessities of the people by extortion, while the masses are not only aiding the government with their limited means, but are making the highest sacrifice by sending their dearest and bravest to fight its battles. The promise of thorough and efficient purging of the sin of profiteering is one of the most gracious gifts the New Year has brought.

In the old legend, the most precious of all gifts—Hope—lay at the very bottom of the casket. It is there, deep down in the budget brought in by 1918, and by-and-by it will be fully disclosed. Meanwhile, let us be patient, working and saving and striving in every way to aid the government in the great task in hand. All the nations are looking toward us today, the Allies with confidence that the United States will be a leading, if not the mightiest, factor in the final struggle to save the world for democracy. Let us keep the high and unselfish aim steadily in view, and seeking righteousness only, we shall find, at the close of this war, other things added unsought. We shall then discover that the divine principle of freedom and justice for all peoples, small and great, which has led us in every war in which this nation has ever engaged, is cherished in the hearts of men everywhere, and that in taking up arms to vindicate this principle we have rendered the world a service it cannot repay.

The Kind of Chaplains Needed

MANY persons have a somewhat hazy idea of the office and duties of an army chaplain. As many new chaplains are needed, it may be well to give a few plain, practical points, concerning the office itself, and the kind of qualifications that are looked for in the incumbent who would fill it acceptably. In the first place, it is made clear by the Committee of the Federal Council of Churches, which represents all the denominational bodies, that the chaplaincy is not a political office, not a soft snap, not an easy salary nor a pension for life, and is no place for people who make failures in other types of ministry. It is a splendid type of men who are going into the chaplaincy—men of high scholastic training, who are making successes in the pastorate, and who have had experience in executive lines of religious work, some of them from the ranks and some holding commissions in present or previous army or navy service. Discussing a chaplain’s qualifications, a well-informed writer says:

A preacher might possess the tongue of an angel and be utterly unfitted for the post of chaplain. First among his qualifications, ninety-nine out of one hundred persons would declare, must be that of “a good mixer.” And yet it is possible for a chaplain, old soldiers say, to overdo the “hail fellow well met” business. A chaplain doesn’t make a hit by going out of his way on every occasion to be “one of the boys.” Without a proper regard for the dignity of his sacred calling he soon loses his influence. What the soldiers want to be sure about is that their chaplain is a real man, without a yellow streak, square and fair, who not only practices what he preaches, but practices more than he preaches. His most valuable work is not done on Sunday, anyway.

For one who would be an ideal chaplain we have in mind the pastor of a large church who has given up his vacation to work as a volunteer in a military training camp. He possesses tact, sympathy and a sense of humor. He has learned to “make allowances” for frailties of human nature, but never a compromise for sin. He has an abundant store of “the sanctifying grace of common sense.” He is brave and thoughtful, but cheerful. We want no professional pessimists among our chaplains. With captains and lieutenants disabled, one can picture him taking command of a company through sheer force of character. His indignation against German atrociousness is of the pale white rather than the red hot variety. No peace-at-any-price person is at ease in his presence. A chaplain like him would be worth a regiment to our army. This is the type of man we need for chaplains. No officers should be selected with more care, for none will play a more vital part in the winning of the war.

There is little question that the men now entering the service will measure up well with the French and British chaplains in spiritual equipment, courage and devotion. Several of them had not thought of entering the chaplaincy until their denominational leaders sought them out, and told them that our sons, who were offering their bodies as the bulwarks of Christian democracy, deserve the very best ministry the Church can offer.

Why the Mails Have Been Late

AN explanation is due to many of our readers throughout the country as to recent delays in the delivery of the Christian Herald.

In making a heroic effort to relieve the coal famine situation, which has imposed great suffering upon hundreds of thousands throughout the country, the Government Fuel Administration found it necessary to take control of all available transportation facilities to bring the coal quickly to the centers of suffering. This necessitated radical measures, but it was such an emergency as has never been faced until now by our government during its whole history. All ordinary travel and transportation were minimized to the last degree possible, in order that the coal might be brought forward quickly. Ordinary business of every kind had to give way before this tremendous emergency. The mails, too, were included, and mail cars had to give way to coal cars. While the emergency lasted, publications of every kind were set aside. The Christian Herald, with a long list of other publications, was among those that had to give way in the face of this imperative situation.

This may be the reason why your paper has not reached you with the usual promptness. We ask your indulgence, knowing that you will fully appreciate the situation as we have explained it above. Please be patient, as every effort is being made to untangle the congestion, which is due to conditions wholly beyond our control.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Divorce in Old Age

WHEN nine grown children of a Texas couple had assembled to celebrate the golden wedding of their parents the father announced that he had selected the occasion as a fitting time to enter suit for divorce. Perhaps it was as fitting a time as any. Yet it is hard for the ordinary mind to realize that a couple who have lived together for fifty years might not, if they made decent effort, live on together for the little time that remains to them. After fifty years a man and wife ought to be accustomed to each other’s shortcomings and angularities. The faults, the shadows, must have become as much a part of their life as have the sweet virtues, the sunshine. They have become molded to each other’s ways, and if they cannot get along together contentedly in those ways they cannot get along contentedly at all.

Divorce sometimes has much of the nature of suicide. This is the case when the marriage relation has been maintained for many years. The man who grows discontented with the wife who has been his helpmeet so long is like the suicide who grows tired of himself. And in such a case divorce is a dissolution that is next to death. To effect the separation all the tendrils of each heart are snubbed, as when a vine is torn loose from the thing to which it has grown. Incompatibility of temper is a genuine source of marital misery, but it is impossible to conceive of incompatibility developing after fifty years of married life. At that late day, the trouble is more likely due to the petulance of senility.

It is in old age that marriage is sweetest. In active life consolation is found in occupation and ambitions, but when age has palsied aspirations the sympathetic companion becomes the dearest thing this side of heaven.

If this old man in Texas had attempted to sacrifice his money instead of his wife, a guardian would have been promptly appointed. But money is one of the things we hold sacred in law. Marriage is different.

The Spirit of Service

“WHOSOEVER would be first among you shall be servant of all.” This was the injunction of Jesus to his disciples, and it goes to the very root of Christian service. It is without any thought of reward or distinction that the United States, ever since the beginning of this war, has been the almoner of the suffering nations. It has sent material aid, in the form of vast stores of food and clothing, as promptly as ocean carriers could convey them, and funds without stint as quickly as the cables could transmit them, to all the fields of suffering. The results of this Good Samaritan work can never be computed in figures, but they are written upon the hearts of the nations we have helped. It has been a world-service in which the Christian Herald readers have borne a very noble and gracious part, and we feel sure that it has been a source of blessing to many who have responded to the call of suffering, even when it has involved self-denial and privation.

This spirit of generosity and helpfulness we regard as one of the finest characteristics of the American people. When Halifax was wrecked, American relief was rushed so promptly that the Canadians marveled. When the earthquake shattered Guatemala’s capital, our naval and merchant vessels along the coast gave “first aid,” and this was quickly followed by the rushing of food supplies from the Gulf ports, together with building material to provide shelter for the homeless thousands. Our sympathy goes out to the afflicted city, and we are thankful that Uncle Sam, wrestling as he is with many difficult problems, has been able, notwithstanding, to render effective service to the sorely stricken republic.

The Art of Being Happy

UNDoubtedly a disposition conducive to happiness may be cultivated. One of its features is a determination to look always “on the bright side”; for one’s attitude toward life is, to a far greater degree than is commonly recognized, a matter of will and habit.

This does not mean that we should shut our eyes to responsibilities, to risks, to dangers and to wrongs, but that we should be governed by our admirations rather than by our disgusts and led by our higher rather than by our lower nature.

Equanimity is another good trait almost equally effective of happiness. What, after all, are the trivial episodes of these brief days on earth, that a human soul should allow itself to be perturbed, vexed, dismayed, baffled and damned by them?

Again, it is possible to train the ability to find delights in little and generally unregarded things—in “the meanest flower that blows.” Positive pleasures, as they are the more intense, are the less enduring. We are unwise to expect or want life to be as thrilling as a drama.

Prophecy Fifty Years Ago

From the Cleveland, O., Press

IN 1866, Rev. Michael Baxter, founder of the Christian Herald, published a book on the “Forty Future Wonders” predicted in Daniel and Revelation, and much of the Biblical prophecy is being fulfilled in our times. The “First Wonder,” between 1906 and 1919, is set forth as one of European wars and revolutions. European convulsions extend the territory of France to the Rhine, and cause a “political earthquake so mighty and so great as was not since men were upon earth.” (Revelation 16.) The “Second Wonder” is Revelation’s “drying up of the Euphrates,” or the Turco-Mohammedan empire, between 1917 and 1919. The “Third Wonder,” 1917 to 1919, is the formation of the ten-kingdomed confederacy by division of all countries of Caesar’s original Roman empire—this resulting from a victorious war of France against Germany, or a revolution in Germany. (Daniel 2 to 8.) Jerusalem, according to Mr. Baxter’s view, is to be restored and the temple rebuilt in 1922 to 1929. After the great wars and revolutions, 1925-1927, comes a black famine followed by widespread pestilence.

Rev. Mr. Baxter did not assume to prophesy, nor personally to fix dates. He was an ardent student of prophecy, and in his book gave the views of the foremost writers on the subject in his time. He died many years ago.

Gives Orphans $2,000,000

WHAT a splendid thing it is for a rich man to give money while he lives, to see and feel the good it does! John E. Andrus of Yonkers, New York, has just founded an orphan asylum at Yonkers in memory of his deceased wife, the value of the grounds and the endowment amounting to $2,000,000. This is to be followed by the gift of many more millions of dollars to other causes. There has been incorporated the Surdna (Andrus spelled backward) foundation, after the Rockefeller Foundation plan, through which he expects to give to charitable causes a portion of his fortune estimated at from forty to seventy millions. Mr. Andrus said he was carrying out plans which he and his dear wife had talked over together before she went away. Mr. Andrus said: "We always thought that little children and old people were equal subjects for our loving consideration. I have concluded, first, to erect and endow in the city of Yonkers on lands formerly owned by my wife an orphan home for little children, preference being given to those, if such there unfortunately be, of soldiers who have given their lives for us and for our country. The plan will differ somewhat from the usual scheme of a great orphan asylum. We will construct detached homes and place them in charge of trustworthy guardians who will take the places as nearly as they can of the absent parents. I intend to arrange the endowment so as to eliminate the possibility of canvassing for subscriptions to obtain the money to make up the usual annual deficit so conspicuous in other institutions of the kind." Mr. Andrus is a former Congressman and is also a prominent Methodist layman. He is the son of a pioneer Methodist preacher, and often talks eloquently of that old-fashioned country parsonage with the beautiful honeysuckle over the door and the sweet home life within. In the foundation of the orphan asylum may he hear the words of the Master saying: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." (Matt. 25 : 40.)

Professor Emil Goldi Dead

DR. EMIL A. GOLDI, who died recently at Berne, Switzerland, began his useful career as the assistant of Professor Haeckel at Jena. He went to Brazil to take a place in the Museum of Rio de Janeiro. He founded and took charge of the museum at Para, Brazil, which was named after him the "Goldi Museum." He remained in Para from 1894 to 1908, when he went back to Switzerland, his native country, and became professor of zoology at the Cantonal University of Berne. With passionate love for the living creatures he

Queen to American Women

QUEEN MARY of England sent a cablegram to the women of America the other day, through Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, the woman suffrage leader, which is as follows: "I re-enthusiasm of the Jewish nation in time of war. The women of England and America who exchanged sentiments of sympathy and cooperation will pray that this song of the Jewish women may be taken up by them before long: "And Miriam took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously." (Ex. 15 : 20, 21.)

Whittier's Barber

AFTER more than sixty years of continuous service as a barber at Amesbury, Mass., Samuel A. Feleh, aged eighty, has concluded to retire from business. Among the many men who patronized his shop during those sixty years was John Greenleaf Whittier, the poet. Mr. Feleh asserts that the introduction of the safety razor, "new fangled ideas" in the after-shave toilet, and the high cost of towels have taken the profits out of the business. He said: "I've cut off enough hair in my time to fill a good-sized barn, and I've used enough bay rum to float a battleship. I've stropped razors for 500,000, and I've got one of the original razors I had when I started at the age of seventeen." The veteran tonsorial artist might have added that he had talked enough to fill a library of books. For it was the style in olden times for the village barber, whose shop was the clearing-house for town gossip and all the news besides, to talk a steady stream while he lathered and shaved his customer. The barbers had their profession among the Hebrews. There is this reference to it: "And thou, son of man, take thee a barber's razor, and cause it to pass upon thy head and upon thy beard; then take thee balances to weigh, and divide the hair." (Ezek. 5 : 1.)

Statues for Bee-hives

A LANDOWNER in Silesia, Germany, has a collection of statues representing Biblical and ecclesiastical characters which he prizes very much. Life-size figures of Moses, the twelve apostles and ancient dignitaries stand solemnly in a row. But the owner mixes business with his fine art, which the highest art critics say never should be done, and has fixed these figures as homes for the busy bees. There is this record of bees selecting a stranger kind of hive than the solemn figure of Moses or Paul: "And he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion; and, behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion." (Judges 14 : 8.)

studied, and patient investigation of them, in his devoted instructions of the young, and to give to the public the result of his researches, he listened to this instruction from above: "Buy the truth, also wisdom, and instructions, and understanding." (Prov. 23 : 23.)

Utilizing Horse-Chestnuts

THE horse-chestnut is a tree of beautiful blossom and large leaves, and is popular as a shade tree. The large richly colored seeds it bears have been regarded as worthless for practical purposes, as playthings for children. But the exigencies of war have compelled scientists to look for elements of utility everywhere. The French chemists have found them in abundance in the seed of the horse-chestnut. From it can be taken materials for making glucose, starch, soap and alcohol, and ground up they make a food that is palatable and healthy for cattle and sheep. The ordinary chestnut has been utilized for centuries. It is used for food by many of the poor of Europe either raw or by boiling, baking, and grinding into a flour for bread. They had chestnuts among the Hebrews, for we have this mention of it: "And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chestnut tree." (Gen. 30 : 37.)

ceived with much satisfaction and pleasure the friendly message you addressed to me from the Women's Committee of the Council of National Defense of America. Please convey to the sisterhood of your great country the warm thanks of the women of the British Empire for their inspiring words of encouragement and assurance. The horrors of war have taught us to know one another better, and they have strengthened the tie of kinship and mutual sympathy by uniting the women of the English-speaking races heart and soul in the struggle for liberty and civilization. Confident of the valuable help we women can give our gallant sailors and soldiers, I pray for God's richest blessing on our efforts."

What a beautiful exchange of human sympathy and encouragement is here manifested! The women bear the sons and have most to do in training them for lives of usefulness and honor. They suffer most when their husbands and boys and brothers are called to their country's service, but with many tears they give them in pride and in deepest loyalty to their country. No finer type of young manhood has ever gone to the nation's defense than ours, and the chief reason has been the virtue, patriotism and piety of our American women. A patriotic woman greatly stirred the

Explorer Stefansson Back

VILHJALMUR STEFANSSON, the arctic explorer, last heard from in a letter received in March, 1916, has arrived with his party at Herschel Island on his way to Fort Yukon, Alaska, according to word received by the Canadian Naval Department, under whose auspices he has made his journeys of exploration to the frozen North. The last expedition began in 1913. It was divided into a northern and a southern section. Stefansson, in charge of the northern section, made his last venture into the realms of perpetual night with the avowed purpose of discovering the "lost continent" supposed to lie to the northwest of the northernmost fringes of Canada somewhere in the Arctic Sea. Rear-Admiral Peary in finding the North Pole thought he had discovered a tip of this continent, which he called Crocker Land, but which was found by the McMillan expedition to be merely a mirage. On a previous expedition north and east of Herschel Island Stefansson had discovered the race of "blond Eskimos." His party started on the government steamer Karluk. Near Point Barrow the vessel was ice-bound and carried eastward to Thetis Island. Stefansson with a small party started out on foot for the mainland. In their absence the Karluk was crushed by the ice and sank, eight members of the party losing their lives in an attempt to reach Herschel Island. Nine men made their escape. Despite this disaster the explorer continued his work in the Far North, making arrangements to journey on foot over the ice to unknown parts of Beaufort Sea. After extensive explorations he returned to Prince Patrick Island in 1915, but with Kellet as his base he went on with his researches through 1916, being joined in May of that year by a party on the Polar Bear at Cape James Murray. In the message sent from Herschel Island Stefansson explained that changes in the route of return were made necessary by the grounding of the ship in the harbor of Barter Island. What splendid seamen the Scandinavians are! Why not, with the sea all about them? They found our continent some 600 years before Columbus discovered it. Stefansson was given up for lost by his best friends for a long time, and now on his return they will appreciate the feeling thus expressed in the parable: "My son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found." (Luke 15 : 24.)

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon
Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS INSTALMENTS

HOWARD CHASE, a young Congregational minister, single, receives a call from a church in Red Hill, a village of seven hundred people in Kansas. After consulting with his classmate and chum, Roy Lennox, he accepts the call and leaves with his sister Rose for his new field, where he is received by Mr. Burton, a deacon of his new church, and his daughter Agnes, and taken to the parsonage, and afterward introduced to the pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches. The following Sunday he preaches his first sermon, and on Monday makes the acquaintance of Inez Clark, the movie-struck daughter of the village editor. He gets 500 "dodgers" printed to advertise an outdoor service for the next Sunday evening. But on the afternoon of that Sunday the town is struck by a Kansas cyclone.

CHAPTER III

IT was the morning after the big storm in Red Hill, and the Santa Fe Agent was standing out on the platform of the little station when the Expressman drove up.

"Some storm, no?" said the Agent, trying to appear indifferent. But the Expressman saw through it as he noted the Agent sweeping glass off the platform onto the right of way, and noted also the absence of all the windows on the west side of the agent's little ticket-office.

"Well, I should say! And have you heard about the church?"

"Mr. Chase's—" the Agent paused in his sweeping and looked interested. "You don't mean—I haven't been up town. Haven't been able to leave."

"Naw. The Methodist. The roof's down in the cellar, an' the organ is on top o' the pulpit. Total wreck. I just drove by it."

"Well, I should call that providential."

"Maybe," said the Expressman slowly. "But I don't believe the Methodists look at it that way. What's providential fer one party is somp'n else fer the other party."

"You bet. No. 12 is six hours late. That's providential for me, because I've got all this mess to clean up. But somehow I'm glad it wa'n't Mr. Chase's church."

"Same here," said the Expressman. "I didn't get to go to church last night. I don't guess nobody went. The corner of his platform got under the wind, and the hull business blew away. They wan't even a nail left. Just nothin' but standin' room only."

"It was some blow all right," said the Agent as he continued to shove the glass off the platform. "There hain't a wire standin' between here and Newton, and it'll take the gang all day to clear the driftwood out the bridge up there. The creek rose ten feet in ten minutes. We hain't had such a breeze since '94."

THE people of Red Hill generally were greatly excited over the storm, which had assumed in spots the character of a "twister."

Howard and Rose, Deacon Burton, Mrs. Burton, Agnes, Mrs. Wilson and little Miss Wilson and a group of church people were out in the Congregational churchyard, noting various freaks of the wind and excitedly exchanging experiences. Howard was looking over the limb-strewn yard and calling Deacon Burton's attention to the fact that one lone electric lamp was hanging unbroken from a corner of the chimney, swinging by a bit of cord about six inches long. That was all that was left of the wiring Howard had run all over the front yard. But with the exception of the platform's complete disappearance, leaving, as the Expressman had said, "standing through. We got off pretty well. Of course you've heard about the Methodists."

"Yes," said Howard; "I understand their building is a total wreck."

"Just about. Nothing left but the foundation, and that was visited in spots."

They came out of the church and joined the group outside.

"Nothing hurt here," said Deacon Burton cheerfully. "Only a few panes of glass gone and a little plaster wet. Not enough to mention."

"Let's all go over. Maybe it's not so bad as they say."

The group moved out of the churchyard, Agnes Burton walking along by Miss Wilson, who hung close to Howard.

"It was a great disappointment to lose the service last night, wasn't it, Mr. Chase?" Agnes said. She was holding Miss Wilson's other hand as they walked along.

"Yes, yes." He was in one of his absent moods for a moment. Then suddenly he came back again.

"Oh, I beg pardon, Miss Burton.

The service? I was plotting—that's the word, isn't it?—on a great time last night. And it came, but not the way I expected. There was one while there just before the storm broke when I believe I was actually afraid."

"I didn't suppose you could ever be afraid of anything, Mr. Chase."

"Why not?"

"Because any man who could accept a call to a little country-town church like ours when he might have a city church must be a brave man."

Howard Chase looked over the head of little Miss Wilson at Miss Burton in real astonishment.

"How do you know I could get a call to a city church?"

"Any one would know it after last Sunday."

Miss Burton spoke naturally and smiled as she spoke. But Howard Chase was looking straight ahead, and when he spoke it was with a grave note as if ignoring Miss Burton's statement and all it implied.

"I accepted the first call I had, Miss Burton. But I would have come West, anyway."

"Do you like the West, cyclones and all?"

"Yes—and all."

Then the girl asked another question, which astonished him more than anything she had yet said; and he realized afterward that he had not so far, until now, during this short walk, spoken more than twenty words to her seriously.

"Why should you come into this overchurched little town to break your heart over a problem that never can be solved?"

"Break my heart!—" he had broken out over her statement, blurring out rudely the first thing that his astonished impulse impelled him to say, looking at her directly, noting the rising color of her face, and for the first time the keen intellectual flash of her eye; but little Miss Wilson tugged at his hand, as he had stopped a second.

"Come, Mr. Chase. See!

See! Where our church is gone!"

THEY had reached the Methodist churchyard, and a large group of people had gathered to look at the ruin; for ruin it was that greeted the newcomers.

By some fantastic freak of the mysterious wind the four walls of the building had been blown entirely away. Parts of them were found afterward miles away on the prairie, some of the windows intact. But the roof of the room only," the church had suffered no damage except the loss of a few window panes.

"See here, Brother Chase, don't you think you'd better consult our people?"

"I thought you said Kansas never had any cyclones, Deacon Burton," said Howard gravely as he and the deacon went into the church to look around. "What do you call the thing we had last night?"

Deacon Burton hesitated. "Well, it came nearer being the real thing than Red Hill ever saw before, and I've been here ever since the Santa Fe came

"But our church is all gone, Mr. Burton," said Mrs. Wilson tearfully. "We are going over to look at it."

LITTLE Miss Wilson had slipped up to Howard and her moist little hand had gone into his.

"Then if our church is gone we can be Congregationalists, can't we, mother?"

"You appear to be one now," said Mrs. Wilson. Deacon Burton hastily spoke up:

church had turned completely over and then twisted around, and lay like a great funnel wedged in between the foundation walls. Parts of the organ lay scattered over the pulpit, one corner of which projected out from a section of the roof. Pieces of pews, chairs, rain-soaked hymn-books, and two sections of furnace pipe lay about the churchyard, while branches of trees and pieces of lumber and dishes from the church kitchen lay strewn over the entire wreckage.

The Rev. Alfred Noyes was there with his flock eyeing the mixture of his church with grave concern.

"A total loss," Howard heard say to Mrs. Wilson, who had gone up to express her sympathy.

Howard and Deacon Burton each said a word in his own way.

"After all, elder," said the deacon. "You ought to be thankful you and your people weren't in it last night. It was providential no one was hurt or killed."

"Well, of course I am thankful for that," said Brother Noyes. "But we had no insurance against cyclones and our loss will be heavy. It's a great blow to my people."

AND then Howard, acting on the impulse of the moment, thinking no farther than an honest thought for others, went up close to Noyes and said, "Brother Noyes, our people will be glad to have you use our church part of the time for services until—"

At that point he felt a pull on his coatsleeve, and Deacon Burton was nodding to him.

Brother Noyes had started to say, "Why, I appreciate that—" when a group of his parishioners came up excitedly to talk over the situation.

Deacon Burton drew his minister off to one side.

"Now, see here, Brother Chase, don't you think you'd better consult our people before you invite the Methodists into our church?"

Howard smiled at Deacon Burton, one of those rare winsome smiles that made little children and rough grown-up men fall in love with him.

"All right, Brother Burton, we'll bring it up at the mid-week service."

"Oh, I think the church will invite them all right," Deacon Burton said quickly. "But it ought to be voted on. Of course we want to do the right thing."

The churchyard, that part of it not encumbered with the debris of the storm, had filled up with Red Hill population. Practically the entire Methodist membership was present. The Rev. Alfred Noyes was the center of a commiserating group. His people were walking over the ruins, pulling out pieces of lumber, the women seeking to save a few pieces of crockery from the wreckage of the kitchen, when one of the church officers, who had been working away at the pulpit, shouted to Brother Noyes to come over.

"Look here!" one cried excitedly. "Look! The Bible is lying here open. Not a leaf torn!"

The Rev. Alfred Noyes examined it. The leaves were rain-soaked, but uninjured otherwise. He glanced down the page that was open until his eye fell on this passage: "For the Lord shall comfort Zion; he will comfort all her waste places; and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody." (Isa. 51:3.)

He read it aloud to the group. And lifting his head he looked around.

"It's a prophecy, a plain providential sign to us. We will rebuild the walls of Zion and enlarge our borders. The people will rally to us in our distress. The Mission Board will help us with a loan. Let us not despair, my friends. Let us rally together around our beloved church and rebuild."

Mrs. Wilson, who had been crying, turned to one of the other women.

"Now, isn't that wonderful? Talk about miracles! We can go ahead and build again. Remember how we worked over this building? We can put up a better one."

"I believe we can," said the other woman. "The Lord seems to be with us. After all, maybe this storm was providential."

HOWARD walked along to the main business street with Deacon Burton, who had been due at his store for an hour.

"What do you call providential?" asked the deacon, glancing at the young minister as they went along.

Howard grinned as he returned the deacon's look. He was fast coming to have more than a liking for his senior deacon; it was growing into a feeling of real affection, mingled with respect for his shrewd mental quickness.

"The word 'providential' depends on the point of view, whether you're looking up or down."

"If the Methodists rebuild," said the deacon slowly, "it will be a mistake, not a providence, as I see it. Years ago we made a proposition to them that we combine our forces, and if it hadn't been for one or two people higher up I think we would have put it through. And I couldn't help feeling (might as well confess), when I heard the storm ruined their building, that maybe now we could get together. But it doesn't look like it. Brother Noyes is great on the Bible. If he works that sentence on the people at the Mission Board he will get the thing going again, and this town is too small for four churches. We can't afford to support all of 'em."

"Why, you don't help support any but our own, do you?"

Deacon Burton stopped in the middle of the sidewalk, and looked at Howard gravely.

"How do you suppose four churches can live in a town of seven hundred and fifty people? If the Methodists rebuild the walls of Zion, every merchant in Red Hill will be expected to contribute. For the last fifteen years I have been giving my quota to all the churches here. If it isn't in one shape it's in another. If it isn't a regular hold-up subscription, it's a fair, or a sale, or a clean-up of some sort."

"I didn't know it was as bad as that."

"Or you wouldn't have come, maybe?"

"I don't say that. We have as much right here as the other, haven't we?"

"Sure. But we've got churches to burn and blow away. Only it looks like they won't stay blowed."

The deacon delivered himself of this with a grin and a shrug as he came to his store, and Howard left him there.

"I think, now I'm here, I'll step over and see Deacon Allen about letting the Methodists use the church. We've got to be decent even if we're not good Christians."

"All right," Deacon Burton grimed. "I don't know how Brother Allen will stand."

HOWARD crossed the street, and Deacon Burton watched him go into Deacon Allen's place of business.

He was there about ten minutes. When he came out he started to cross the street and go into Deacon Burton's, but paused, seemed to change his mind, and started back to the parsonage.

As he turned the corner going west from the main street he met Inez Clark.

He was going by with a bow and a "good morning, Miss Clark," but Inez stopped almost in front of him and said, "Father wanted me to say if I saw you that seeing as how the storm spoiled the outdoor meeting last night he would strike off five hundred more dodgers for nothing if you wanted them for next Sunday."

"I appreciate that. Please tell your father so. But I don't know yet about the evening service. We may have a union meeting with the Methodists."

"Oh, I hope not!" Inez exclaimed. "Why should they spoil our plans?"

Howard did not say anything, only looked at the girl gravely.

"I don't like the Methodists," Inez said with blunt emphasis. Howard felt and looked amused. But he started on, simply saying, "Thank your father for his offer. If we have our service I'll bring the copy over in time."

She did not say anything in answer, but as he turned the next corner to go up to the parsonage he glanced back and saw Inez still standing where they had met. She was not looking in his direction, but she was standing perfectly still.

Howard went on to the parsonage and into his little study. As he sat down to his desk he struck it a blow with a hard fist. Then he put his elbows on the desk and stared, open-eyed and grave, at a picture on top of the desk and in the middle of it.

It was a picture Roy Lennox had given him after a trip abroad.

IT was a picture of Christ in the desert. On a brightly illuminated high tableland in the background marched a procession of kings, emperors, warriors, the high and mighty and strong of the earth, and behind them a gloriously appareled group of artists, musicians, scholars and scientists. Then followed a group of laughing girls, and in the center, drawing all others to her, was an alluring figure, representing Woman, in all her blending of mysterious good and evil, holding out a jeweled hand, beckoning the one who looked at her to come and walk with her.

The artist had so arranged this line of figures in the world procession that this woman focused all attention on herself at first.

But as one looked closer at the picture he saw, crowding up around Jesus, beseeching faces and pitiful outstretched hands, the hands of disease and want and the faces of sin and despair. The whole world for all time to come was there, clinging to his garments, stretching out agonizing arms like drowning people; and one fair woman, oh, so wondrous fair, was kissing the Master's feet, her streaming hair covered with dust and the trace of a hideous human foot on her neck.

Christ himself in this picture, at which Howard was now looking, was gazing neither at the world-greatness and allurements on the tableland, nor at the world sorrow below; but his face was lifted above a dark circle toward an opening in a cloud, out of which one line of light fell straight down until it rested on the face of the woman who lay at Jesus' feet. And the effect of the picture was finally to leave the spectator doing what the artist had planned—leaving him with his gaze absolutely on the face of Christ, obliterating all other figures, even those of the alluring woman above and the sinful woman below.

HOWARD could hear his sister in the dining-room at work on something. He sat at his desk a few minutes, then he went over and quietly closed the door, stood a moment in the middle of the room, and then suddenly knelt at his chair and flung his head upon his hands with a muffled cry.

But in a moment he was on his feet again, and going out into the other room began to tell his sister about his plans for the coming Sunday.

"I asked Brother Noyes to use our church for services. Deacon Burton objected and said I ought to consult our members."

"I should think so. Howard, you will get into trouble. You are not a pope here."

"I'd like to be for a while. Do 'em good. Some one has got to lead."

"Or drive," said Rose, who admired her brother immensely, but had great common sense and was not afraid of using it for his benefit. "People don't like to be driven, Howard. Coax 'em."

"But how about those who can't be coaxed?"

"People who can't be coaxed are the kind that can't be driven."

"Well, I tell you, sister, first the minister has to go in front and pull, and then he has to go behind and shove."

"The Good Shepherd is generally in front," said Rose quietly.

"Well, I guess you're right, sister. But I got in front of Deacon Allen this morning, and for a while I was afraid he was going to run over me. But he finally came along like—like a little lamb, to use the figure we started with."

"What did you do? I'm a little afraid of Deacon Allen. But isn't Deacon Burton lovely? And Agnes?"

The Joys of Bran

Good Cheer—New Vim—Fitness

Please find out why so many authorities are urging the use of bran. You can learn the results in a week. And you'll never return to branless diet after that, we think.

Bran is Nature's laxative. It supplies the needed roughage. People who omit it find that fine foods clog. And most folks take laxative drugs.

Now a Luxury

Bran is now made a luxury food by hiding the bran in wheat flakes. That is what we do in Pettijohn's. And we do it by doctors' advice.

We use bran flakes—not ground bran—to make the bran doubly efficient. And we hide them in a delicious morning cereal.

No breakfast dish was ever more inviting. Yet every dish is one-fourth bran in its most effective form.

Let it prove itself. Serve it daily for a week and watch its good effects. It will better your breakfasts and better your days.

Pettijohn's is saving millions of dull days. With countless people it is ending the need for drugs. Every day it is bringing a wealth of good cheer.

When you try a week of Pettijohn's you will want every week like that.

Order a package now.

Pettijohn's

A Cereal Dainty—25% Bran

A breakfast dainty whose flavory flakes hide 25 per cent unground bran.

Pettijohn's Flour—75 per cent fine patent flour with 25 per cent bran flakes. Use like Graham flour in any recipe.

Both sold in packages only.

EARTHQUAKE AND WAR

Already shaken by the tread of marching feet and the recoil of guns, the old earth has added a few shocks on its own account; but it was the peaceful Guatemalans who suffered.

French soldiers arriving on Italian front in auto trucks went also by train and on foot.

How the Pullman Company Handles the Peak Load —

WERE every one of the one hundred and thirty-seven railroads served by the Pullman Company to attempt to furnish the same service for itself, the burden of expense would be found insupportable.

Each road would have a heavy investment in extra cars which would be idle perhaps eleven months in the year; and it would be forced at certain times to man all these cars with green crews—to the great discomfort, inconvenience and anxiety of the public.

The Pullman Company mobilizes its seventy-four hundred cars—each as perfectly appointed in its way as a modern hotel—with the keenest strategy. It knows at every hour of the day the location of each one of them; it notes the least threat of congestion here, or shortage there, and is on the alert to supply maximum service wherever needed.

Pullman service meets a national problem; it gives to our passenger traffic facilities a stability and a mobility otherwise almost impossible.

"Yes, I think the deacon is great. But Deacon Allen—well, he's the great objector, I find. He's good—oh, he's good, but he's awful good. He'll want his heavenly crown sent up on approval, and have it taken in at the bottom or the pearls reset. But I think I understand him pretty well. I finally got his consent on conditions."

"Consent to what? You haven't told me."

"Why, consent to invite the Methodists to use our church a part of the time for their services. When I looked at their ruin this morning it didn't seem to me anything less than common decency to offer it."

"But it will spoil your plans for services, won't it, if you—"

"Yes, of course it will. But I'll have to work all the harder in between Sundays. A minister's main work is done during the week."

"Maybe the other churches will offer the use of their buildings part of the time. 'It seems too bad to give up your plans for the Sunday evening.'"

"Perhaps we can unite in some way. But I am hungry to preach. I don't want to listen to Brother Noyes. I want to preach myself."

"And you ought to, Howard. I don't believe you realize what a gift you have that way. A week ago Sunday, the first Sunday, I saw people listening to your sermon who I am sure don't generally care for sermons. There was one girl in the chorus, that Inez Clark, who seemed to be just completely absorbed in what you were saying. She isn't the kind of a girl, I am sure, that usually cares for preaching. She is a pretty girl, but it's a magazine kind, and, by the way, Agnes Burton dropped a word this morning about her that interested me. She said Inez Clark was going crazy over the moving picture shows, and wondered if we could do anything to get her interested in anything else."

HOWARD had been moving over toward his study door. He stopped with his back to his sister.

"What did Miss Burton say?"

"Why, she said the girl was going to the show every night and was in danger of several things. She said she was a romantic, highly imaginative thing, had been all through her high school course, and she feels deeply interested in her."

"I don't see what—" Howard began. Then, after a pause—"I'll talk with Miss Burton about it."

He went into his study leaving his door open, sat down to his desk, and began to plan out his program for the week. He had been at work about an hour when his sister came in.

"I'm going over to the church, Howard, to rehearse with Miss Burton. You know I am to sing a solo next Sunday, and she is going to play for me. I haven't sung in a long time. But I—I want to do all I can to help you. It's the only way I can keep from—"

"Dear girl!" said Howard, "I know. You're the bravest woman I know."

The tear was in his eye as he kissed her.

She went out and he resumed his work. Then he found he had left his hymn-book over in the church, and he needed it to make some selections.

He went out, crossed the yard, and went in. The door and windows were open, and Rose and Miss Burton were up on the platform. Rose was singing "My Redeemer," by Dudley Buck, and her voice sounded sweet to Howard. It was not strong, nor specially good in any technical way, but she sang with feeling, and while he knew nothing of music and could not sing a note himself, he did know enough about it to detect the difference between what was decently good and atrociously bad.

A FREE WAR COOK-BOOK For Every Woman Who Reads the CHRISTIAN HERALD

THE food that America saves will go far toward winning the war. This is a task that rests on the women of America. They control the consumption of nine-tenths of our food.

The War Cook-Book for American Women, compiled from official sources by Frederic J. Haskin and issued by the United States Food Administration at Washington, is ready for distribution.

The War Cook-Book will be sent free to readers of the Christian Herald, upon request, through the Christian Herald Information Bureau at Washington, D. C.

The War Cook-Book is a digest of the Hoover doctrine of saving by proper selection and the elimination of waste. The economy it teaches is primarily a war economy. It tells how to save the foods that the armies must have if the fight shall be won, and it tells what foods to use in their place and how to prepare them.

It contains the suggestions and the requests of the Food Administration, condensed into a few clear paragraphs. Of particular interest and value to the reader is the handy table of "Food Elements" which shows almost at a glance how to plan a properly balanced meal and select a balanced diet.

The thirty pages of this free book are filled with new recipes, original formulas, and suggestions showing every woman how to do her share in the great American campaign to put the Golden Rule above the Iron Law.

SMITH BROTHERS of Poughkeepsie

The Too-Absorbing Vision

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"THAT chap," said the Business Man to me, "has the expression of a dreamer."

"Is that anything against him?" I questioned, rather flippantly. "And which chap do you mean?" For our subway car was crowded.

"I mean the fellow over in the corner," the Business Man told me; "the one with the pointed nose and the strange, intense eyes. The one in the black hat and coat."

I followed his gaze and looked at the man in the black hat and coat—looked at him with interest. He was a big man, with a strangely detached expression. One thought when one looked at him first that his eyes were rather too close together, but after a moment it became apparent that it was only the expression that made them look so.

"An interesting face," I said.

"A dreamer's face!" corrected the Business Man none too gently. He accented the word "dreamer."

I myself have always rather fancied dreamers. I have many times built my castles in Spain out of thin air and rose-tinted soap-bubbles. I have seen them vanish and have built them, lovingly, all over again.

"I don't," I said to the Business Man, "understand why you speak in that tone of voice!"

The Business Man smoothed his expensive tie with an expensively gloved hand. He was a bit complacent.

"Dreamers," he remarked in a large manner, "never get anywhere!"

Hotly I resented the remark.

"Some folk," I said, "who aren't dreamers don't get anywhere either!"

"Quite so," agreed the Business Man. "Quite so!"

There was a silence between us for a moment. It was the Business Man who broke it.

"You see," he said, "it's this way. A dreamer fixes his eyes on something directly in front of him, and he stares at it (get the expression on that chap's face!), and he stares at it, and he stares at it until it absorbs him. And pretty soon he's forgotten that there's anything but the something directly in front of him."

I spoke again in defense of the dreamer.

"Isn't his concentration worth while?" I questioned.

The Business Man smiled—smiled as one smiles who has come out far ahead in an argument.

"It would be," he told me, "if the whole world didn't lie on the other side of his vision!"

The man in the black coat and hat rose from his seat. Still absorbed in his dream he walked down the aisle of the car. His gaze was far ahead and he did not see the three pairs of feet that he stumbled over. He jostled against an old lady, not rudely, but thoughtlessly. At the door he paused to question the guard.

"Is this Times Square?" he asked.

"Times Square," the guard told him, "is two stations back."

With a vaguely annoyed look the dreamer hurried out. I turned to the Business Man.

"Do you think," I questioned, changing the subject, "that we'll have much more snow?"

But that night, when I reached home and was alone in the quiet of my room, I began to think again of the dreamer in the subway, and, strangely enough, a sentence from my conversation with the Business Man came back to me. "His concentration," had said the Business Man bluntly, "would be all right if the whole world didn't lie on the other side of his vision!"

DREAMING is all right! I wouldn't much admire the man or woman who had never dreamed a dream or built a castle in Spain. Dreaming is one of the intensely human things that keep people close together. But dreaming, like anything else—no matter how worth while it is—may be carried too far.

I ONCE knew a little girl whose mother wanted to give her some medicine for a sore throat. It was pleasant medicine, made of honey and white pine and a bit of lemon.

"Take it, dear," I heard the mother say. "It will be good for you!"

The little girl took the medicine, and she liked it very much indeed, for it was sweet medicine. And so, later in the day, she made various excursions to the medicine bottle.

It was a large bottle of medicine. But the little girl, having been told that it would be good for her, had no qualms about consuming it. And she was very much surprised when she was taken suddenly and violently ill.

"What," she sobbed, "is the matter with me? I feel awful sick."

Her mother gave one look at the bottle of medicine and another at her small daughter's distorted face.

"Where," she questioned, "has that medicine gone?"

"You said," the little girl, still sobbing, told her accusingly, "that it was good for me. So I drank it. But it wasn't!"

A doctor was called rather hurriedly. He laughed after the manner of doctors.

"There's nothing in the world to really do her harm in that medicine," he said; "it's only the sweet that's making her sick. She'll be quite all right in a day or two!"

She was quite all right the next morning. But she went around in a chastened manner, for she had learned a lesson. She had learned that a little of something may be good for one, while a great deal of the same thing may do an infinite amount of harm.

AND that same lesson applies to the folks who are dreamers. A certain amount of dreaming is the butter that makes the bread of life pleasant to eat, and the salt that seasons the existence of every day, and keeps it from being flat.

But the person who dreams at all times and in all places—the person who spends his whole time dreaming—is, as the Business Man said, not likely to get anywhere. For he cannot see beyond the vision that his dream has built, or through the illusion that his fancy has painted.

Friends of mine, it isn't hard to strike a happy medium. Don't allow dreams to be swept from your life—that would be a terrible thing to do; don't take away the rose-colored glasses that color your world with light and beauty; don't allow yourself to be so busy that you can't see romance and poetry in the everyday. But—keep your vision small enough and detached enough, so that it will serve as the frame on the picture beyond it—the picture that is a great world full of great people who are doing great deeds.

Four-and-Twenty Sparrows Baked in a Pie

JACOB RIIS describes in one of his delightful essays how the good old housekeeper in his Danish home used to climb to the eaves to rob the sparrows' nests for a delectable pie. Now Mr. James Hunt of Philadelphia, who is crusading against the English sparrow, advocates the pie as the true destiny of the sparrow. He furnished the sparrows for such a pie opened in Washington recently at a luncheon served by the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The guests declared that the pie was good, and the flavor of the sparrow was superior to chicken and equal to partridge. Washington boys found this out long ago in their secret sparrow roasts, where dozens of these tidbits were spitted on wires before the blaze and devoured by these food pirates.

Cleaning a sparrow is a simple matter of cutting the breast away from all other parts and skinning. Special traps are used for catching sparrows. These are set near favorite rookeries and dozens of sparrows are caught at a time.

One of America's Wonders

Bubbles of Wheat and Rice

At the Panama-Pacific Exposition we exhibited Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

There came Japanese, and saw their rice grains puffed to bubbles, eight times normal size.

There came men from Russia and from India—homes of wheat. And they saw gigantic wheat grains, steam-exploded, thin and airy, yet still shaped as they grew.

And those men by the thousands went back to their homes to tell of these American wonders.

To you they seem commonplace, perhaps.

But inside each grain our process creates a hundred million steam explosions. Every food cell is blasted for easy digestion. The grains are shot from guns.

Prof. A. P. Anderson spent years on the process—to make whole grains wholly digestible. The result is the greatest foods ever made from these grains. Also the most delightful.

Puffed Wheat

Puffed Rice

and Corn Puffs

Each 15c Except in Far West

Don't Treat Like Confections

These are ideal foods, in which every granule is fitted to feed. The Wheat and the Rice are whole-grain foods, of which children get too little. They are immeasurably better than whole-grain foods cooked in usual ways.

They are enticing—thin, crisp, flaky, with a taste like toasted nuts. They are widely used in candy making.

But, despite their attractions, they are wondrous foods. Make them your breakfast cereal. Mix them with your fruits. Float them in bowls of milk. Salt like peanuts, or douse with melted butter, for children after school. Every serving means clear nutrition in a fascinating form.

SONG STORIES OF THE SAWDUST TRAIL

By HOMER RODEHEAVER
Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

YOU can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ. Homer Rodeheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail."

"Rody" in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing the four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. He relates how another song, "My Father Watches Over Me," sung at a mission service, called a poor, sick, criminal and wanderer back to Christ and happiness. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associates, to his wife and family, and tells how all his former happiness was restored.

AFTER DEATH, WHAT?

By REV. MADISON C. PETERS

WHEN the late Dr. Klopsch published "After Death, What?" some years ago, the book was received with tremendous enthusiasm and the editions published by him were soon exhausted. Successive editions were not published, yet the demand through the intervening years has been large. For this reason we have thought it wise to bring out an entirely new edition of this wonderful book.

It is impossible to give more than the briefest glimpses of the rich character of the contents of this attractive volume. Among the subjects discussed are: "Does Death End All?" "Light After Darkness," "The Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "Heavenly Reunions," "The Joy and Comfort of Faith in Immortality," "Occupations in Heaven," "Our Children in Heaven," and many others, including poems of comfort and master minds on the life beyond. In addition to the above masterpieces of thought and literature, it contains a vast collection of golden gems from the greatest historians, philosophers, preachers and poets of all ages and nationalities on other phases of the future life.

UNCLE SAM'S ADVICE TO HOUSEWIVES TWO SPLENDID VOLUMES

FOR many years the United States Government has been employing experts to study the most economical methods of preparing foods with a view to telling the housewives all over the country how to get better and tastier food for less money.

The result of these investigations has been printed in pamphlets issued by the Government. But no general collection has ever been made until this one, which has the approval of the United States Department of Agriculture and of Herbert Hoover's Food Administration.

CAP'N ABE, STOREKEEPER A CAPE COD STORY

By JAMES A. COOPER

DO you like to read about doings on Cape Cod, among the quaint characters who inhabit that locality? Would you like to read of what happened to a high-bred city girl when she suddenly landed down there to take up her living with a relative she had never seen? Would you like to read how loquacious Cap'n Abe, the storekeeper, who could tell more marvelous yarns than any other man on the Cape, suddenly disappeared, and of how his brother from "furrin parts" appeared to take his place?

Would you like to read about a most perplexing mystery that came near being turned into a tragedy, and of how a man who was a rank coward at heart forced himself to play the part of a hero? In this volume, humor and pathos are well mixed. Many of the doings along the Cape shore are taken from life. Tender love scenes are not lacking; and there is high excitement when a great storm wrecks a vessel off the coast and it looks as if some of the loved ones might be drowned.

To meet Cap'n Abe, is never to forget him.

Jesus Forgiving Sin

International Sunday School Lesson for January 27

Mark 2:1-12

Meeting Man's Deepest Needs

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

IN our first chapter Mark pictured graphically Christ's speedy rise to full tide of popularity in Galilee. In a few weeks his fame had spread until he was compelled to go from place to place because of the multitudes. Our second chapter opens with Jesus in Capernaum again, "at home," probably in Peter's house, although some believe he had a house of his own (see Matt. 4:13). At once "many were gathered together," crowding the room, the vestibule and the little courtyard, to listen to his teaching. Then comes the touching incident of the paralytic borne of four, the removing of the tiles of the roof, the letting down of the sufferer to the very feet of Jesus. Looking earnestly into the face of the palsied man Jesus saw that which caused him to say, "Child, be of good courage; thy sins are forgiven."

Those Stretcher-Bearers

If you are teaching a class be sure to begin the lesson with the four friends. All boys and girls are interested in first aid and the Boy Scouts are keen on "making a stretcher." These men furnish an example of unselfish ministry. In bringing some one else to Jesus they reached his presence themselves with the highest recommendation in his sight. We may be sure that they did not fail to go away with their own peculiar blessing. But how true it is that just to have rendered so great a service to another is reward enough! Thousands of heroic men have gone out into No Man's Land under fire to bring in the wounded. Many of them have testified to the satisfaction and joy of succeeding in the task.

The four friends leave us not only an example of service but a lesson in co-operation as well. So often it takes real team-work to succeed in well-doing. That is where the Church is oftentimes weakest. We could bring thousands more into vital contact with Christ by exercising a bit more team-work between minister, superintendent, teacher and classmates. In your school are these four cooperating to bring every unconverted soul to loyal allegiance and Kingdom service?

Service, cooperation and persistency! How those stretcher-bearers stuck to their task! I can imagine them persuading the man to let them try, and I can imagine him reluctant because of a sense of sin that made him dread the pure eyes of Jesus. I like to think of them steadily plodding through the streets and then begging, pushing, striving to get through the crowd. Unable to pass, they confer together, and one suggests the roof. No sooner said than done, or at least worth trying. It is no small job to get a helpless cripple up on the roof of even a one-story adobe house. Then to think of their daring in taking up tiles and swinging their friend down through the hole. Surely this story will hold the attention of the most restless class of boys. One lad interrupted this tale to ask if the scribes were not angry because the dust and stones might have fallen upon their heads. His teacher ventured to respond that there were some people who would actually fuss over things like that when there were souls to be saved and paralytics to be cured.

A Soul Brought to Christ

Jesus looked upon the man's soul rather than his body. There must have been spiritual longing in that face, hunger and thirst after righteousness beyond the mere desire for bodily strength. Doubtless his friends had thought entirely of his bodily needs. But Jesus knows what are the greatest gifts. He calls the sinner "child," with utter kindness in his voice. He bids him "be of good courage" with regard to his standing in the sight of God. He as-ures him of pardon: "Thy sins are forgiven." New hope, new interest in life and its possibilities, are awakened in the sick man. Already he is on the way to wonderful things. His cure has begun, though he thinks not of his helpless limbs at all. Jesus has paved the way for "Arise, take up thy bed."

All around us are souls that we might bring to the Healer of souls. People who though we know it not are just as much in need of sympathy as this man, just as pathetically eager to hear the words "Be of good cheer." Ian MacLaren said at the close of his fruitful ministry that if he had his life to live over again he would devote it more completely to comforting and encouraging the struggling men and women who are all around us wherever we may be.

It seems too bad that these men had to go to so great trouble to fight their way to the presence of the Master. The hearers in the house and the merely curious persons on steps and in the courtyard were selfishly keeping the needy from their mighty Helper. By just selfishly crowding around they were actually blocking the way to Jesus. It reminds me of a time in the city of Brooklyn when Gipsy Smith, the great and winsome evangelist, was preaching, and the meetings were so thronged with church-members that the unsaved could not so much as get into the house! A count of hands showed practically all present were earnest believers, who had come out of curiosity or with the best of intentions to help. They had to be asked to stay away and let the unconverted in.

But more often it is sadly true that the path to Christ is blocked by thoughtless lives and empty professions. The greatest single hindrance to the progress of the Church has been declared by leading evangelists to be the lack of spiritual life in professing Christians. Is it not true that there are people who clutter up the pews every Sunday who actually do nothing to bring others within hearing of the Gospel? Only the other day I heard of a man whose pew was occupied by a stranger and he actually requested the newcomer to get out of his seat! The stranger got out—clear out through the back door. In spite of the minister's cordial invitations to return, the outsider said, "Never again."

That is an extreme sample, but how numerous are the little incidents wherein the characters of professing Christians repel instead of attract! The world is apt to forget the thousands of earnest, loving, unselfish disciples when confronted with one or two who are unworthy.

The Forgiveness of Sins

One of the mightiest utterances in the Apostles' Creed is "I believe . . . in the forgiveness of sins." However, there are those who do not seem to understand all that such a belief implies. Jesus practically always links up the divine forgiveness with our forgiveness of one another. You know how it is in the Lord's Prayer, we practically promise to forgive those that sin against us, because of the consciousness of God's forgiving love shown to us. Indeed, Jesus once said that if we forgive not men their trespasses, neither will our Heavenly Father forgive us. The unforgiving man shuts himself out of the Kingdom of Heaven. Now we can best understand Jesus' attitude in our present lesson by noting that one of the great shortcomings of those scribes and Pharisees lay in just that censorious and unforgiving spirit. It was part of their pious pretense to say that only God could forgive, using what was in a sense true to cover their lack of love. Jesus tells them that the Son of Man hath authority on earth to forgive sins. He vindicates this claim in their right by bidding the man to rise and walk.

The deeper teaching lies here, that Jesus calls himself the Son of Man whenever he would identify himself with man. Every Christian has the power to reassure the penitent soul of God's pardon. To forgive those who have offended against us is only a foretaste of our supreme ministry to meditate the forgiveness of the Father against whom they have really sinned in all wrong-doing. "We beseech you on behalf of Christ, be ye reconciled to God." No unloving soul can "exercise the ministry of reconciliation."

So, then, there is a sense in which Jesus spoke for God to the agonized man, in which we also can venture to speak "in His Name." Only a great inner conscious of his fault can appreciate the wondrous love of God, I suppose. Yet in the presence of Infinite Holiness, not only vile evil-doers but calm scholars and gentle women have appreciated the sinfulness of sin and the marvel of divine forgiveness. God's love means love to one another. He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our transgressions. How then can we as children of God deal with one another according to our sins and reward after our transgressions? "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and railing be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you."

Giving a Man Another Chance

The essence of the Golden Rule dictates giving every man another chance. That was Jesus' way: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." There is small profit in forgiveness itself if it is just like a bit of book-keeping, wiping off the slate. What we need to do is to get a new spirit and to inspire a new spirit in our soul-paralyzed acquaintances. We do not want them to go on piling up a new debit of sin. We want the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus to set us all free from the law of sin and death. Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not. It has been the secret of the mightiest lives of unselfish and pure discipleship that they have had their inspiration in gratitude to such a kind, forgiving Father as Jesus told us of. Like John in his epistle, they have exclaimed to their fellow travelers on life's highway, "Beloved, if God so loved us, we also ought to love one another."

Sunday School Methods

How the Contest Plan Helps the Pastors

THAT preacher is most efficient who is a teacher. Jesus Christ was a teacher supremely. He taught through his life, he taught through his words. "The life of the teacher is the life of his teaching."

The preacher's great drive should be to get the Bible into the minds and hearts of the people, in order to motive the life aright; not simply to give his opinions on the topics of the day.

Mr. Gladstone said: "Talk about the questions of the time! There is but one question: How to bring the truths of God's Word into vital contact with all classes of people." That pastor, therefore, has the most successful church who has made the Bible the familiar and loved Book in the largest number of the homes of his people. Any method that can get the people searching the Word and familiarizing themselves with the facts and teachings of the Book should be welcomed as a pastor's aid.

A method that has on several trials brought together in one effort over sixty thousand and in another forty thousand people as eager searchers of the Bible texts, must have in it elements which should attract the earnest inquiry of pastors and teachers. And if the plan helps the teachers of the Sunday School, who are really sub-pastors of small groups, to teach the truth more effectively and interest the scholars as never before, it should not be lightly considered.

Best of all, it furnishes the home with the Bible material arranged in convenient form for the daily family worship of the home, the bulwark of the church's real strength.

The Christian Herald's Bible Picture study plan is the pastor's assistant in accomplishing just these things.

For five months, beginning with December, the International Uniform Lessons, the Golden Texts and the Daily Bible Home Readings will form the basis for the new study. Thousands of people will be searching the two thousand verses in these selections, which have been compiled in a book entitled "International Bible Readings," to discover the texts which most nearly answer to the thirty pictures.

Many old church members, grown rusty in the Scriptures, have had their memories of many passages made keen by the interest of this search. Over and over those who take part travel through these passages and become familiar with these truths.

Many pastors make the Sunday school lesson or some truth in that lesson the theme of their prayer meeting talks. How the interest in these meetings would be increased for both the church members and the Sunday school members if the home had been busy searching the texts of these Lessons and Home Readings!

The Christian Herald will furnish all of these Lessons and Home Readings in the form of a little book which can be used in the home for the purposes of this Contest, for the daily readings which are used in family prayer and as a companion in travel.

The terms of entrance into the plan are so easy and the gain in many ways so great that pastors, teachers, scholars and parents are urged to write to the Christian Herald at once on the plan outlined on the inside back cover of this number of the Christian Herald.

Any one can start at any time before April 22, but the earlier the start the longer will be the enjoyment of the plan and the more familiar will these verses become.

Hymn Writer Joins the Choir Above

MRS. ANNIE SHERWOOD HAWKS, author of "I Need Thee Every Hour," and many other Gospel hymns which have been sung around the world, died at Bennington, Vt., January 3, at the age of eighty-three. Mrs. Hawks was one of a group of noted hymn-writers who wrote during the latter half of the nineteenth century—a group that included such names as Fannie Crosby, P. P. Bliss, Ira D. Sankey, Eben E. Rexford and Rev. Robert Lowry. To the last of these, who died November 25, 1899, Mrs. Hawks owed much of the inspiration for her poetry, and he set several of her hymns to music.

Mrs. Hawks was born in Hoosick, N. Y., in 1835. Her first verses were published in a Newspaper in Troy, N. Y., when she was fourteen years old. She married Charles Hial Hawks, a banker of New York, and lived in Brooklyn until her husband's death in 1888, after which she lived with her daughter in Bennington, Vt.

Her first hymns were written in 1868, at the suggestion of her pastor, Rev. Robert Lowry, the famous composer. She thus describes the writing of her most celebrated hymn:

"I remember well the morning, many years ago, when these words, 'I Need Thee Every Hour,' flashed into my mind. Seating myself by the open window I wrote the words almost as they are being sung now. They were set to music a few months later and sung at a Sunday school convention in one of the large Western cities."

This hymn is said to have been translated into more languages than any other production of the great nineteenth century hymn-writers.

Heavy Stone for High-Powered Cars $1.25

IF YOU put your spark plugs in a vise and exerted all your strength to subject them to the greatest possible pressure you would expect the porcelain to crumble.

Yet that's virtually what they must stand in your motor.

As you get under way the explosions in your cylinders become so rapid that the force they exert is practically continuous.

In Champion-Toledo Dependable Spark Plugs the shoulders of the porcelain insulators are cushioned against this tremendous pressure.

Champion Spark Plug Company, Toledo, Ohio

The two patented copper gaskets that protect the porcelain where the pressure comes are lined with asbestos so that the metal cannot touch the porcelain.

That's one reason why Champions are so much more durable and dependable than ordinary spark plugs.

Get the Champion-Toledo Plug designed to serve your kind of motor (your dealer or garage man knows which one) and you have assured maximum efficiency and durability.

Be sure that the name "Champion" is on the porcelain—not merely on the box.

GOODYEAR
AKRON

World-Wide Supremacy

IN its last fiscal year this company made and sold more pneumatic automobile tires than any other maker in the world.

From the great Goodyear factories more than 5,300,000 tires were delivered into the public's hands — the largest number ever marketed by one company in the same length of time.

The immensity of this figure can be realized only in the knowledge that the total American registration in 1917 was approximately 4,600,000 cars.

Thus, despite the competition of more than 200 other tire makers, Goodyear attained an average of better than one tire to every motor car in the land.

Nothing that we have ever said of Goodyear Tires, whether in these pages or elsewhere, compares with this indorsement by the American people.

Such superiorities as we have claimed for our product, such declarations of quality as we have issued, are here more powerfully verified than by any words.

In elevating Goodyear Tires to the position of supremacy they now occupy, the public does so not only by force of its opinion but by the dollars it spends.

The belief of the average car-owner in the goodness of Goodyear Tires is a belief on which he is willing to stake not alone his judgment but a considerable investment as well.

Notable as is the size of last year's record volume, size is not at all the most significant thing about it.

The significant thing is that this total climaxes a production that has been steadily and irresistibly increasing.

Not for one year or for two, has the appeal of Goodyear Tires for the public been strong, but for year after year without break.

The pace of this institution's growth, almost since its inception, has been in direct ratio with its acquaintance among the people.

It cannot justly be said that either salesmanship or advertising has been mainly responsible for Goodyear's great growth.

Salesmanship and advertising appeal chiefly to new business; there is not enough of it in the country to absorb this great volume.

Far more potent than either of these in the success of this company, has been the goodness of a product which held old customers while gaining new.

It is from this source largely that our business has flourished, out of the satisfaction of the public it served.

The policy on which this institution has been reared is so simple as to be an inspiration for us all.

That policy, as expressed in our labors and dealings, is "the more we put into our product in goodness, the more we will take out in sales."

Because we will continue to exercise this policy, this business will continue to grow.

Because it is the foundation and insurance of our present supremacy, that supremacy will not be surrendered.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

AS I stood, this evening at dusk, looking down upon New York City, watching the lights twinkle out in that roaring black cavern far below, listening to the restless surge and grind of the city's traffic, wherein lonely stranger brushed coldly past lonely stranger, I longed to share with all those self-absorbed, hurrying folk an experience that came to me years ago.

A friend—a woman of broad sympathies and great kindness of heart—said to me, early one December:

"If you want more joy this Christmas than you have ever known, make it a point to greet every single person you can! Wish the street-car conductor a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year, and the girl at the ribbon counter, and your grocer's boy, and the telephone operator, and the children on their way to school, and the street-cleaner, and the woman you accidentally jostle in the crowd. And when New Year is past, keep right on through the year with your smiles and good wishes."

"But," I remember protesting, "how could I? On holidays it's well enough. But what, for instance, could one possibly say to a cross conductor on a rainy day in March?"

My friend laughed, as well she might. How dull of vision I was!

Leaning over, with her face shining, she laid her hand on my arm.

"You could express the hope that the sun would be shining the next day, couldn't you?"

Very cautiously I followed her suggestion, however. The results were electrifying. Never shall I forget that experience!

It was like the old fairy-tale of the sleepers who came to life at the touch of the magic wand. For round shoulders straightened, on street car and in elevator. Faces brightened. Indifference fled. Eyes lighted eagerly, then twinkled with good will. Comrades sprang up everywhere all about me.

After the holidays, it was a bit more of a puzzle always to know what greetings to offer. But by degrees this problem solved itself. For I discovered the hobbies of these new friends. And we often had a word about them—in car or elevator or store. It was a break in their day and mine. And we were both the happier for it.

For, as the writer of the following letter has said: "He lives most who—"

BUT I will let him talk directly to you—this brotherly neighbor of ours. And I wish, when you have read his fine letter, you would sit down and write me what you think of his suggestion that we women "neighbors" give the men a share in our little corner.

MY DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: I regret that, being a man, I cannot become a member of your Neighborhood Community. Could you not plan for an associate membership of men who are deeply interested in this work? You do not realize how "Adventures in Neighboring" enters into the lives of those who would be lonely and discouraged without it. Some one has said: "He lives most who lives most in the lives of others." W. A. S.

I wonder if you were startled, as you read that hearty letter, by the words "members" and "associate membership," knowing that we women neighbors, cooperating through this Department, have never organized ourselves into a definite club.

I was startled, too. And yet I am very glad these terms were used. For they fall right in line with a plan I have been at work on for weeks.

I have believed, for some time, that we "neighbors" should organize ourselves into a great "Community Club" with branches in the various villages and towns. I, for one, would be willing to throw open these few columns as a sort of "world hall" in which to hold our meetings. Certainly no mere town hall would ever hold us, or a hundredth of us!

Of course, such a club would have to be a very broad and all-inclusive one, without dues or "don'ts," many rules or much ceremony. It would have to be just a sort of fellowship of neighbors the land over. Our emblem might be a circle; our name "The American Community Club." Our officers might be chosen every six months, by vote, from among the writers of published "Adventures in Neighboring." (For of course we would go right on publishing our adventures.)

These are mere suggestions. The whole matter lies with you. It seemed to me that as fellow club-members we would feel better acquainted, and freer to talk out in meeting, to make suggestions, offer kindly criticism, propose plans, recount experiences, ask for advice, and so on. But perhaps I am wrong.

At any rate, please send me your opinions—even though you write only "yes" or "no" on a slip of paper and mail it to me. For the best letter on this subject, I am going to pay five dollars; and for all others which I publish a dollar a letter. And, as a token of appreciation, I am going to print, as a kind of "honor roll," the names of all those who send me any opinion on the subject. No address will be printed.

All these letters must reach my desk against the middle of March. In an April issue the prize-winning letter, and others, will be published.

Oh, yes—just one last word: do not let your letters about the founding of the Club interfere with your sending me in, each week, your "Adventures in Neighboring." I shall want quantities of these, in any case. And do continue to send in your splendid comments on the published adventures. Some of these comments—showing the inspiration our adventures are to other communities—I am soon going to publish, for the help and encouragement of writers and readers alike.

And now, with these matters off hand, we can plunge joyously into today's visit with one another.

THIS first letter is an unselfish appeal—for advice and suggestions—which I am going to depend on you to help me answer. Some of your answers I will publish; the others I will send on this dear neighbor.

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: I am so pleased with the new department opened up in the Christian Herald, as now I can "neighbor" with my Christian Herald neighbors.

Just a word about neighboring.

I am living with my son on a small farm. I came here in June last. Only one neighbor has been in to see me. The others are "too busy." Now, I have been wondering what I could do to bring a little sunshine or restful recreation into the lives of these women neighbors. Their lives are very monotonous and gray.

They are sensitive, like all of us; and I am afraid of appearing officious.

I have raised a family of nine children myself, six being strong, healthy, live boys. So I understand boys. My husband and I were always companionable with our children, and that way won their confidence.

Well, since coming here I have watched the boys of the neighborhood, when they thought no one was looking. And I was shocked. We must win them over some way!

The school is not far away, and I enjoy visiting there. I like the teacher. She does her best; but she needs the mothers' help. And they are all "too busy" to give the necessary attention to the children God put into their trust to train for his service.

I have wished a Sunday school might be started. What do you think? And how can I get the mothers interested? How can I get some social life started?

MRS. N. H. W.

There, fellow neighbors, is a problem for you! How can a community, where work is a god, be aroused out of that state into one of human kindness and sociability? And what would you do for boys like those?

MEANTIME, here is a most adorable "Adventure," as heart-warming an act of love as any yet sent in:

Being Neighborly with Animals

Some years ago I was teaching school in Emmet County, Iowa. The town was small, but a growing one. A new railroad was coming in, and the graders were at work. They had turned out on the prairie, to live or die, a poor old horse which they thought could be of no use to them.

He managed to feed on the young grass quite near to the schoolhouse. Finally, he fell down; yet his digestion was all right, for he nibbled the grass as far as he could stretch his neck.

The thought came to us that if we could feed him, perhaps he might grow strong enough to help himself. The children all entered into the spirit of it, and every recess and noontime they not only cut grass but brought grain from home, and also gave him water to drink.

How he did eat! Nothing wrong that way, we concluded. He was simply overworked and starved.

Finally, all the larger boys got him up onto his feet. This had to be repeated often. But at last he began to move around, and soon looked out for himself. MRS. A. H. C.

AND speaking of neighborly kindness, here is another instance of it—a deed so simple, so easy to perform, that I am afraid very few of us ever think to do it:

Welcoming the Minister's Wife

I think one of my dearest experiences in neighboring was when, in the early days, we moved to a new town in Oklahoma.

One of my neighbors was a pastor of a church; and they also were newcomers, although I did not know it.

While putting up our winter's supply of meat, I took a bowl of extra-nice sausages to the pastor's wife. I was very much surprised when she broke down and began to cry.

She said: "Oh, Mrs. K—, you don't know how much you have helped me by this neighborly kindness! We have had so much opposition to our work here, and the people have treated us so coldly, that I felt as though we did not have a friend in town. But your kindness and interest have shown me that I was mistaken; and I feel ashamed that I was so discouraged."

She was a stranger in a new country—a dear little homesick woman, who needed mothering. And oh, how glad I was I had brought a "cup of cold water" to her!

MRS. A. E. K.

THIS leaves us with space for only one more letter; and I have chosen—just as additional reminder of my suggestion that the men folks be given a share in this Department—a letter which will show that the men need, almost more than we do, the joys of neighboring:

A Social Club for Men

I have been reading "Adventures in Neighboring," and I thought our local adventure might prove helpful to some other community.

Our village has been over-supplied with various clubs for women, but the only men's club until last spring was the one which assembled nightly in the corner store.

At that time a few public-spirited men invited, by word of mouth or by phone, all the men of the village and surrounding farms (within a radius of some three or four miles), to meet on a designated evening to organize a Men's Brotherhood.

About one hundred and fifty men responded to the invitation; an organization was effected; officers were elected; and those present heard an excellent address and some good music.

All enjoyed the evening and were eager to continue the meetings. So it was arranged that they should meet once a month, and that there should be a speaker and music provided, and light refreshments served.

The dues are fifteen cents a month; an amount found to be ample. Once every four months, the women are invited. The club is now planning an annual outdoor picnic, with games and races.

This organization has two aims: to provide an opportunity for the men (and incidentally the women) to get together; and to bring an inspiring message to the men, many of whom do not attend church or read anything but the daily paper.

The addresses are usually given by pastors from nearby towns who are known to be exceptionally good public speakers. An orchestra provides the music, and the social hour before the close of the meeting is thoroughly enjoyed.

And now, good-night, fellow adventurers! I shall be watching my mail eagerly for word from you on all that we have discussed this week. But especially, I shall be looking for more "Adventures in Neighboring."

"Abe" Lincoln comes to LIFE in a great motion picture!

To LIFE—from boyhood to Presidency

THIS is not dry history. It shows "Abe" as he was in the log cabin days, a rambunctious boy full of fight and mischief, and then unfolds the vivid drama of his life through ten thrilling chapters, one given at each performance.

All America is lining up to see—

Benjamin Chapin in "The SON OF DEMOCRACY"

—a series of dramatic film stories of America in the making

Benjamin Chapin is a fine actor and a fine director, but that's not the point—he has made a life-study of Lincoln's appearance, character and career, and he looks as much like Lincoln as your right hand looks like your left.

After seeing "The Son of Democracy" series, Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, wrote to Mr. Chapin, "It was a real pleasure to see your interpretation of Abraham Lincoln . . . his career will forever be a thrilling inspiration to all Americans."

Each of the ten chapters is a drama complete in itself. There are all sorts of funny complications. For example, the queerest little pickaninny you ever saw steals a white hen, and "Abe" the boy is the attorney for the defence. Such a trial! The jury alone would make a cat laugh.

"The Son of Democracy" is the real thing in wholesome entertainment, and beneath it all you feel a solemn thrill that this boy, this regular little fellow, is to become the President of the United States.

Demand "The Son of Democracy" at your motion picture theatre. Find out when it is scheduled to appear, and then GO!

GO in a body, you and all your friends and all the family and everybody. Don't leave anyone at home, not even Grandma, because it's a bully show with a strong universal appeal. It opens the windows of the heart wide and lets in warmth and sunshine.

Young People's Topics for January 27

The Darkness of Night

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Rom. 1: 25

AFRICA has been well named the Dark Continent. Its people are dark in hue; its races, through long centuries, have lived under the shadow of superstition; its sons and daughters have gone into slavery, and its toilers have been exploited, oppressed and cruelly mistreated by those who sought for gain and cared not how it came.

David Livingstone opened the portals of Africa and showed the world the bleeding heart of the continent. The Stanley expedition focused the attention of Christendom upon the work of Livingstone. The Cape-to-Cairo project turned the eyes of the Anglo-Saxon world once more toward Africa, and the Boer War and the report of the atrocities in the Congo revealed again the plight and need of the native Africans and emphasized Africa's appeal to Christian missions. All of this is a great story. Africa's darkness is now being riven by the light of Christ. The Gospel is being taken to Africa's millions, but Islam is active as well, and the present question is, "Shall Africa be won for Mohammed or for Christ?" The answer will be given largely by the Christians of America. Leaders can secure additional helps for this topic by addressing the Department of Missionary Education, 23 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York City, enclosing 10 cents to cover cost of mailing.

Christian Endeavor Goals and How to Reach Them

Christian Endeavor Topic. Rom. 12:1-13
Christian Endeavor Day

JANUARY 27, Christian Endeavor Day, begins Christian Endeavor Week, which ends on February 3 with Decision Day. The leader of this meeting will need to be much upon his knees and more upon his mettle. Christian Endeavor today is the strongest force in united Christianity. Through it young life is being trained for church leadership and inspired for service. Christian Endeavor is a living, vital stream which is turning into the Church day by day a steady current of growing power. All the officers of the local society should join with the leader in making comprehensive plans to bring to the individual church a full appreciation of what Christian Endeavor stands for, what it means, what it has accomplished, and what it may fairly be expected to achieve. It would be well if the interest of the pastor were also enlisted, and if the Sunday evening services on January 27 were entirely given over to a great inspirational meeting, led by Endeavorers, and vitalized with the true spirit of Christian Endeavor.

Such a meeting would give an opportunity for a certain degree of stock-taking. Get together on the platform as many as possible of your former Endeavorers, now active in the councils of the church. Perhaps they have forgotten, in part, their spiritual debt to Christian Endeavor; perhaps others in the congregation may not know that these are graduates of the Young People's Movement. Getting them together, giving them opportunity to dedicate their life anew in the spirit of their first consecration, will both strengthen the power of the Church and establish more firmly the position and opportunity of the Endeavor Society.

Special helps for this topic may be secured by addressing the United Society of Christian Endeavor, Mount Vernon and Hancock Streets, Boston, Mass.

Young Christians Reaching Upward

Epworth League Topic. Gal. 6:1-10

THIS topic was treated in this column last week as the Christian Endeavor topic for January 20.

Saving Coal and Health

THE Fuel Administration has inaugurated a campaign for the substitution of wood for coal. The utilization of the wood supply would go far toward meeting the shortage of fifty million tons in the coal supply. One cord of hard wood equals a ton of coal.

In some sections of New England and the South are vast supplies of wood. Governor Brough of Arkansas is calling attention to the burning of wood in clearing new ground, and the Federal Fuel Administration of North Carolina has established municipal wood-yards. The use of convict camps is urged in localities where they could be utilized without interference with free labor. Boy Scouts and school children are aiding conservation by making use of waste products.

An instance of this was set forth in a letter by Macey F. Deming of New York, who collected thousands of pounds of fuel from waste-piles. He said: "To show them how they could help win the war I offered to pay one cent for each three pounds of waste coal they picked up along the roads and in ash heaps. In live days 1,633 pounds of good coal was brought to me by sixteen children, most of them under ten years of age. The boys earned from ten to fifteen cents in two hours after school closed and thought they were having grand fun. One little fellow made the remark that an ash pile was a regular gold mine. About 120 children, none over the eighth grade, raised over $100 in ten days, marched to the bank and bought a Liberty Bond."

Endorsement of the campaign against overheating has been given by eminent physicians. Dr. James J. Walsh, physician, doctor of philosophy, author, says:

"Pneumonia takes a little more than one man in eight, and therefore has wrested from tuberculosis the grim honor of killing the most human beings. Man is a marine animal, seven-eighths water. He needs cool air and moisture around him. Overheated dry air makes him too susceptible to disease. In a temperature of over sixty-eight degrees it is difficult for men and women to exist healthfully. If Americans can be taught to live in this temperature the number of pneumonia victims will surely decrease. Fresh, cool, moist air is the foe of pneumonia, and persons who keep their houses cool and breathe fresh, moist air need have no fear of it."

Jerusalem for the Jews

THE Hebrew-Christian Publication Society, which has been doing active work in enlightening the Jews of America in the truth of the Gospel, is now laboring with greater zeal than ever in view of the important changes that are expected to follow the capitulation of Jerusalem. The general secretary of the Society, B. A. M. Schapiro, writes: "This war is a subject of Bible prophecy, and a large part of its permanent result will possibly be the restoration of Israel to the land promised by Jehovah to our forefathers. The Allies are intent, not on the destruction of the Holy City, but in preserving it for God's chosen people. It is of greater importance now than ever before that the Jews of America, or some of them at least, should have the Gospel armor in which to return." This is the immediate task to which the Hebrew-Christian Publication Society is now addressing itself. It will welcome any co-operation on the part of Christian Americans who take an interest in the spiritual enlightenment of the Jewish race. They regard it as the greatest opportunity in a thousand years to bring them into the Gospel fold. The Advisory Board of the Publication Society heartily approves of the special effort now being made, through tracts and personal effort, and hopes that the Christian public will aid in the work. The Board includes Colonel Alexander S. Bacon, Bishop Charles S. Burch, Rev. David James Burrell, Rev. Canon John Cornell, Rev. Charles L. Goodell, Rev. Frederick Lynch, Rev. Kenneth Mackenzie, Rev. George R. Vandewater, Professor Willis Fletcher Johnson, New York University, Rev. W. H. Morgan, Rev. Robert Watson, Anson W. Anderson, M. D., Frederick L. Dochtermann, and James Wood, president American Bible Society. Interested readers who desire to help in this work can address the Society, in care of The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Why is the Large Intestine Five Feet Long?

Man Originally an Active Animal—Now Suffers from Poisons in Accumulated Waste—How Science Combats This Problem.

Professor Elic Metchnikoff, in a great work in which he first pointed out the method and effects of auto-intoxication, has an interesting theory about the large intestine. Nature made it so long, he theorized, because originally man was an active wild animal. He was often in danger from other animals and would have to run long distances. For his safety it was necessary to have an organ in which waste matter could be stored. There was, however, little danger of clogging of the colon, because continuous natural exercise kept it from being lazy. Its muscles functioned normally.

The large intestine which Nature fashioned was perfectly adapted to wild animal life. It is not adapted to civilized life. Man is no longer a wild animal. He is easily the most inactive large animal on earth. He is a sitting animal. He almost never walks when he can ride. The first thing physicians tell him usually, when he is in a rundown condition, is to "get out in the air and exercise." But many of us are too busy to exercise; and still more of us, when we exercise, exercise the wrong muscles. The most important, the most vital muscles to exercise are those of the large intestine, for the simple reason that those muscles cause more trouble by their laziness than all the other lazy muscles put together.

A remarkable new method has recently been found for stimulating the muscles of the colon. It is based on one of the oldest and soundest methods of treatment—massage. By means of a device known as the Kolon Motor concentrated exercise is administered to the colon, effectually overcoming constipation and many of its attendant ills. Send for free book, "Colon Cleanliness," full of interesting information, and detailed description of the Kolon Motor. Club Feet

Little Robert Taylor was born with deformed feet. Plaster paris casts were used without success—so he was brought to the McLain Sanitarium. His parents' letter tells the story:

"We are more than thankful for what you did in straightening Robert's feet. Of course his feet are terribly scarred from the plaster casts, but there are no scars from your work on him. His feet are so straight, and he runs, jumps and does anything any other boy can do." Mr. & Mrs. John W. Taylor.

1516 So. Flower St., Los Angeles, Calif. This is not a selected case—neither is the result unusual. In correcting this deformity no plaster paris or general anaesthesia was used.

Vapo-Cresolene

Established 1879

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold. Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boom by Asthma sufferers.

For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities. It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

The War in Europe

THE battle of the guns continued this week on every front, and yet in most of the shell-swept area the actions were covered by the laconic phrase "nothing of importance." At three points, however, important actions occurred.

On December 30 the Germans attacked south of Cambrai on a front of about two miles, and succeeded in gaining, temporarily, certain British positions on a row of heights called Welsh Ridge. The British lines were penetrated north of La Vacquerie and south of Marcoing. The German attack was made under the protection of a fierce bombardment and with liquid fire. It was stopped short of the crest of the heights, British counter-attacks later in the day and on the day following completely restoring the position.

On the following day, December 31, French troops in Italy, at a point where the line across the Asiago Plateau joins the Piave River, attacked and captured the Austrian positions on Monte Tomba. The French captured 44 officers, 1,348 men, 60 machine guns, 7 cannon and a large quantity of other war materials, with little loss to themselves.

The German attacks upon the Italian northern line were not continued during the week. Reports through Switzerland told of heavy snows which had practically halted all military movements.

On January 2 the Austrians, who had been driven across the Piave River at the Zenson bend, made another attempt to cross to the Italian side at Intestadura. The attempt was completely repulsed by Italian artillery fire, none of the Austrian troops reaching the western shore.

Austrian aviators on December 31 dropped bombs on the Italian city of Padua, setting fire to the ancient cathedral, built in 250 and containing priceless treasures of Italian art. Frescoes by Titian and Campagnola were uninjured, the main structure of the church with its copper roof having resisted the bombs; but the dome took fire and burned throughout the night.

British troops continued their advance north of Jerusalem during the week, passing north of Bethel about New Year's.

The U-boats were out in force during the week, and while suffering a greater number of losses themselves in December than in any previous month, they succeeded in closing the year with a fair week's record of twenty-one British ships sunk. Of these eighteen were over 1,600 tons and three below that figure. The British tonnage at the beginning of the war, in ships over 1,600 tons, was officially announced on January 3 to have been 16,341,519 tons; the loss by enemy action, less new construction, purchases and captures, during the war has been 2,750,000 tons.

The British navy lost three torpedo-boat destroyers on December 22, through mines encountered off the Dutch coast. The loss was announced by the British Admiralty on December 29; 13 officers, 180 men, were lost with the vessels.

On December 29 American loans to the Allies passed the four-billion mark.

Major General Enoch Crowder, in a report made public January 3, declared his conviction that it would be possible to meet America's military needs by calling to the colors hereafter only the men included in class 1 of the draft registrants. This class consists largely of unmarried men. General Crowder estimates that at least 700,000 men will come of age each year. He reported that out of 3,082,949 men who were called for military service throughout the country, 252,294 failed to appear, this being 8.08 per cent. Up to late December, 5,870 arrests have been made; 2,263 were released after being registered; 2,095 cases remained to be prosecuted on December 31. A total of 1,057,363 men have been certified for service, and 687,000 were named in the first call.

The documents upon which the German Government could base its allegation at best only prove the manifestation of the will of a few privileged groups, and in no way the will of the masses in those territories.

"We now declare that the Russian Revolution remains faithful to the policy of internationalism. We defend the right of Poland, Lithuania and Courland to dispose of their own destiny actually and freely. Never will we recognize the justice of imposing the will of a foreign nation on any other nations whatsoever."

"This joint session insists the peace purporters be communicated later to the neutral States and instructs the Soldiers' and Workmen's Councils and the Commissioners to take measures to bring this about."

"We say to the people of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey and Bulgaria:

"Under your pressure your Governments have been obliged to accept the motto of no annexations and no indemnities, but recently they have been trying to carry on their old policy of evasions. Remember, that the conclusion of an immediate democratic peace will depend actually and above all on you. All the people of Europe look to you, exhausted and bled by such a war as there never was before, that you will not permit the Austro-German Imperialists to make war against Revolutionary Russia for the subjection of Poland, Lithuania, Courland and Armenia."

The difficulties of the Germans are illustrated by the statement of a member of the Russian delegation, Pavlovich, who himself is not a Bolshevik but a Socialist student of international affairs. He says they mobilized for the Brest-Litovsk conference their most brilliant experts in economics and diplomacy. Their tactics were remarkably flexible until the arrival of the Ukrainian delegation. They went very far in concession to the principle of no annexations and no indemnities; but after the arrival of the Ukrainians General Hoffmann declared that the Germans would not evacuate the occupied territory, because, while peace might be concluded with the Bolsheviks, other portions of the Russian Army might continue the war with help of England and France and seize Brest-Litovsk and other important strategic points. The Germans refused to evacuate the occupied territory until the conclusion of general peace. They cared nothing for the form of government in Russia. Their only concern was whether peace would guarantee the complete neutrality of the whole Russian Army.

Germany, said Pavlovich, was prepared to evacuate Belgium and the occupied territory of France, but apparently only on condition of the evacuation of Mesopotamia and Arabia, otherwise the Germans' prestige in the Mohammedan world, as in the whole world, would receive a deathblow.

The Petrograd correspondent of the London Daily News reports: "Two perfectly distinct tendencies were noticeable in the enemy delegation; one, annexation, represented by Gen. Hoffmann, and the other more moderate, represented by Dr. von Kuehlmann, the German Foreign Secretary, and Count Czernin, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister. There were frequent disputes between these two tendencies, settled in each case by appeal to Berlin, which without exception supported Czernin and Kuehlmann."

Meantime the German delegations fill the chief hotels in Petrograd. German commercial travelers are offering subscriptions to German papers, and Germany promises soon to open direct postal and telegraphic communication with Russia.

The prospects of the Constituent Assembly are dimmer than ever. The Social Revolutionary leader and former Minister, Avksentiev, has been arrested and the chief members of the League for the Defense of the Constituent Assembly have been lodged in the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul. The Social Revolutionaries are trying to effect a compromise with the Bolsheviks as to the date of the opening.

Germans and Russians have been designated to arrange an exchange of prisoners and resumption of the mail services between the two countries. Trains are running again between Riga and Petrograd.

Suffer Little Children to Come Unto Me

Luke 18:16

Picture No. 11

FROM THE CHILDREN

I am engaged in the contest. Am eleven years old. It was fun looking up the verses but not so much writing them. I will send in my Reply Book soon. It has done me lots of good. I hope I will win a prize. I knew most of the pictures so it was easy. I made a few mistakes I know.—C. G. R., Minnesota.

I have my contest answers all ready to send. I have enjoyed it very much. I am Harold's sister and have taken the work up. I hope you may continue your contests. I am fifteen years old.—Miss H. H., Iowa.

I am trying the Bible Picture contest. I am so interested in it. I can hardly wait for the next week's paper. I hope I get one of the prizes. I'm working so hard for an education. My mother is a widow and is helping me all she can. I've been to Sunday school all my life but I cannot tell you how much your contest has helped me.—R. E. M.

I just want to write a few lines in regard to your Bible Picture contest and try and tell you how much it means to one girl at least. My mother is a subscriber to the Christian Herald and has been for several years and we all enjoy it so much. But if I get no reward I greatly enjoy all Bible knowledge I can get.—L. F. S., North Carolina.

I am doing my level best to study up the contest pictures so as to be ready to send in the Reply Book on time. I have enjoyed the time so much, what time I have to spare. I have been going to school. I am now 14 years of age and I hope some day to be an educated man.—W. M. H., Texas.

I am working hard for a prize as I would like to study to be a missionary, but haven't the means; but if I don't win I shall not be discouraged.—A Country Maiden.

I want to write you a little note and tell you how much we enjoyed your Bible Picture contest. I am a little farmer's daughter twelve years old and have tried hard to win the prize.—G. S.

I am enjoying it each day more and more. It helps me to know more about the Bible and become more interested.—D. J., age 12 years, Connecticut.

My father takes the Christian Herald, which gave me the great pleasure of searching the Scriptures for the answers each week. Am sorry the contest is ended. It proved a pleasure as well as a source of deeper knowledge of Bible stories.—E. M. S., Illinois.

A young person successfully competing in the Bible Picture Study may gain, too, enough money to further his or her education, for

$5,000.00 in Cash Will Be Awarded

First prize is $1,000.00 cash, second prize, $750.00 cash, third, $500.00 cash, and there are 1,001 prizes in all—each in cash. And every participant must gain the greatest prize of all—the reward which is in the truth and promise of the Bible

And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart.

And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. Deut. 6:6, 7.

Passing on the Light of Bible Truth

THE problem of interesting children in the Bible, and—which is just as important for their lives—of leading them to understand and accept the moral guidance and spiritual discipline of the Scriptures, is not an easy one to solve.

Parents often ponder this problem, in many cases without solving it.

God-parents often are uneasy at the thought that their little god-children, to whom they owe the most sacred religious obligations, are not being raised with an appreciation of what religion should mean in their lives. Yet this situation is a peculiarly delicate one, in that an attempt to improve the condition may be resented as improper interference.

Children cannot be driven. They must be led. They cannot be "trained." They must be attracted. The things they are forced to do they generally detest. The things they love are the things they love to do.

Pictures

Children love pictures. Any parent knows what long hours are spent in "telling" pictures to the children.

"What is the man doing in the picture?" the child asks. "Why does he do that? What does the woman say, then?"

In pictures depicting the Bible the older people find an opportunity to tell Bible stories, Bible truths, to their little charges—and then of leading the children to search out the Bible truths for themselves, to become interested in the Bible, and interested in what the Bible means.

Our Picture Study

In the National Bible Picture Study this opportunity is doubled, for the Reference Book, the book from which the pictures are answered, is a compilation of Bible verses chosen for children—the Sunday School Lessons, together, of course, with the Daily Home Bible Readings which explain the Lessons, and the Golden Texts.

Thus the child who becomes interested in the pictures—and every child will at once be interested in them—will very easily be led to become interested in selecting from the Reference Book the verses that fit or answer the pictures. And then, probably interested in Sunday School and Christian work.

This is indeed a golden opportunity for elders to solve the problem of interesting young people, of whatever age, in the Bible. Read on this page what parents say about this, and what some of the children themselves have written us.

We were more pleased to receive these letters from our children than we can express. It made us feel that our Picture Studies have a new and fine purpose. Read every letter published on this page.

How You Can Help

By taking up any of the offers below you may have the complete outfit sent to a child, even though the Christian Herald subscription involved is for yourself.

But those wishing to send the Outfit and Christian Herald too to some child will find the new six-months' offer best fitted, very probably, to their purpose. By it you may present the Christian Herald and a complete Outfit to a child, and, by adding 10 cents to the offer, receive the Outfit yourself, too. Present subscribers who wish to interest young folks living at some other address will be especially pleased with this offer.

The rules, which are free on request, explain how competition in the Study without expense is made possible.

Do you know of any child whose life may be made better and happier now, and whose later years may be made more beautiful by a knowledge of the Bible? If so, do you not feel a duty toward that child, a duty toward your religion? Do you not feel that you will discharge your duty, in arranging to have the child sent the 30 Picture Study Pictures, the Reference Book of Bible verses from which he or she will choose answers for the pictures, and the Answer Book in which the young person will write down his or her selections?

Read the offers below carefully.

LETTERS FROM PARENTS

I am glad that the pictures have represented, as a whole, familiar stories of the Bible, as it has been such an encouragement and interest for the young. In our family of six children—ages from 16 to 3 years—the paper has been eagerly watched for, from week to week, by even the little ones who could not read very well; and our little three-year-old girl enjoys having some of us tell her the stories from the pictures.

I pasted the pictures each week in a book, and used one of Perry's pictures of "Jesus and the Children" for a front-piece, and it is a nice children's book for Sunday afternoons. We consider it has been a great benefit to our children, and hope we shall see more Bible pictures in some form again.—Mrs. G. C. B., New York.

It is with a feeling of sadness that I mail to you today my little daughter Nan's set of answers, for I shall miss the pleasure we as a family have found in trying to solve the pictures. For some months I have been an invalid and I am sure that nothing could have helped me as these pictures and the work connected with them has done.

I feel, too, that the benefit Nan has derived has been wonderful—and all the other children have been helped in proportion to the amount of study given.

Now I'm hoping that you will decide to continue the Bible pictures, whether a reward is offered or not, before my little folks lose interest in this sort of research. I see that many subscribers feel as I do about it—that nothing else has helped so much in arousing interest in the study of the Word.—Mrs. W. T. W., Texas.

Let me say that I cannot begin to tell you how I enjoyed the Bible Picture contest. Wish you would give another. I preserved all my pages of pictures, sewed them together, and at the close of the contest passed them on to my children, offering prizes for best answers.—Mrs. W. T. C., North Carolina.

This is indeed a fine inducement to us to study the Good Book, and it has helped me to interest my little great-grandchild in her Bible story book.—Mrs. L. S., Missouri.

I have a crippled boy who helped me in looking up answers. . . . I feel that I have received from this study knowledge from the Bible that I shall never forget. "God's word in the sword of the spirit."—Mrs. I. E. W., Vermont.

It gave me so much pleasure inasmuch as I had the opportunity to share with four high school boys in looking over the pictures, and they became so deeply interested that I feel well repaid for the effort in their behalf as well as my own.—Mrs. A. B. R., Maryland.

I have enjoyed the contest so much, and hope you will continue it. My two boys took great interest in it also. They were both at school, but I kept the books until they returned in order for them to get the benefit of the study.—Mrs. D. F. S., Georgia.

Are You A Road Menace?

Be Safe With This Green Glass Visor Lens

Would you knowingly start a trip with a defective steering gear?

Glaring headlights are as dangerous for you and others. Besides they are illegal!

Barring accidents, how long do you think you can evade the law with menacing open-face lenses?

Why take the risk of lenses that send blinding upward rays—or that must be dimmed beyond safety in order to avoid arrest?

Macbeth lens complies with laws; does not imperil with blinding glare; and does not weaken or diffuse light.

It wastes no light but concentrates it all on the road where needed.

The front surface of the lens is divided into five horizontal prisms—each inclines at an angle determined with scientific accuracy.

The concave recesses in the back of the lens spread the light laterally, thus providing the very essential side lighting for turning corners.

No other lens is backed by the same world-wide lens experience, facilities and resources.

Macbeth lenses for motor cars are made the same careful and scientific way as Macbeth searchlights and lenses for harbors, dreadnaughts and battleships.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

WOODROW WILSON is the greatest missionary in the last hundred years!

He has preached to the nations. When he wrote those words for the fly-leaf of the Bibles that were given to American soldiers leaving for France, he gave one of the most powerful Christian messages that any prophet has ever delivered. By those words he gave the people of southern Europe an entirely new aspect of Protestantism.

Imagine what this meant down in southern Europe where the Bible has always been tabooed. Not with the favor of the Vatican has there ever been an open Bible. Then President Wilson came along and put his stamp upon it, and said, "The Bible is the Word of Life! I beg that you will read it and find this out for yourselves. Read not little snatches here and there, but long passages that will really be the road to the heart of it. You will find it full of real men and women.

The more you read it the more it will become plain to you what things are worth while and what are not. When you have read the Bible you will know that it is the word of God, because you will have found it the key to your own heart, your own happiness and your own duty."

THAT foreword has been translated and read by the soldiers, by the citizens, and has been printed in the newspapers and commented on editorially by the French, Italians, Russians and men of other nationalities. But this is only one thing that the President has done. Every message that he has sent out—his answer to the Pope, his calling for the declaration of war against Germany—has shown such manifest spirit of Christianity, such poise, such evident desire to be just, that it has preached to the millions. It has not only put America in a most strategic position morally, but it has given a spiritual message to those people who were groping about in darkness, not knowing which way to turn.

Things in Europe are pretty well smashed up now, and I doubt if there is a government that will survive the present war. I believe that every one will be overturned—the fundamental organization of the government, not simply cabinets. You will witness great changes from it in America. After our American troops have been through the terrible sufferings and horrors of a three, four, or five years' campaign, they will come back to the States with some ideas on government of their own and you will witness some great social disturbances.

THE greatest thing that has happened to our work is what President Wilson has done for the moral leadership of our nation. It has shown southern Europe the character of Protestantism and the character of America. Six months ago, Roman Catholicism was again powerful in Italy. I say again, because the old fight for union and freedom that resulted in

Italy and the World War

By REV. B. M. TIPPLE

MR. TIPPLE is superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Rome and president of the Collegio Monte Mario. He was given the order of "Cavaliere della Corona d'Italia" (Knight of the Crown of Italy) by the King of Italy for the emergency hospital work which he and Mrs. Tipple did at the time of the Marsica earthquake when Avezzano, a city of 25,000 inhabitants, was destroyed, and because of the very large and modern program which they instituted for young men in the Collegio. Medals have been recently awarded to both Dr. and Mrs. Tipple by the city of Rome in recognition of their war relief service. Dr. Tipple left Rome December 4 and arrived in this country December 29. He speaks not only from a wide but recent knowledge of conditions in Italy.

Empires all along have been most solicitous about the Vatican, and have shown themselves most friendly with it, while the Vatican has issued peace notes when the Allies did not want them. They were an embarrassment to the Allies, but insistently the Vatican—with Germany—continued to send them out. The last one came after Lloyd George and the President had said emphatically that they did not want peace notes. That shows the hostility of the Vatican to the Allies.

AND why should not the Vatican be with the Central Powers? The last great autocracy left in Europe is the Vatican. In Germany, in Austria—in all the countries—the rich, conservative elements move in sympathy toward the Vatican because it is the last great stronghold of vested rights, of the monarchical idea.

When the Pope issued this last appeal for peace it greatly embarrassed the Allies. It was distributed among the soldiers at the front, particularly in Italy, and was read by those soldiers, weary of the fighting. After this message had come from the Pope, the priests who had gained the confidence of the soldiers came to them and said, "It is too bad! The Holy Father wants peace. Everybody wants peace. We must pray for peace." They did not say anything treasonable, but they talked to the boys in this way, of the desire of everybody for peace, and it really took the nerve out of many of them, so that, when the Austrians made their offensive, perhaps the defensive was not as strong as it otherwise would have been. Thousands and thousands of people are saying ing in Italy today that the weakening of Italy's resistance was due to the influence of the Vatican propaganda promulgated by the priests. They are saying nothing openly and officially, but there is the general feeling in nearly all circles that the real fault of this great disaster is to be laid to the Vatican and its activities. The result is that Benedict XV finds himself in the most difficult position since the days of Pius IX when the troops of Victor Emmanuel came into Rome. Unless the Pope changes his attitude, we shall hear of some radical doings in Italy after the war. I have seen no such spirit against the Vatican as there is today.

THERE never was a clearer issue than that between the Allies and the Central Empire. It is as clear as daylight that we are fighting the fight between autocracy and democracy. America is not only fighting for the freedom of France and the other Allied European nations, she is fighting for democracy, for the rule of the people, for her own independence. It we lose, America will sign over.

My own impression is that Germany has just begun to fight. I believe that it will take from two to four years at least to win the war, and that in the crowning of the King in Rome in 1870 and the destruction of the temporal power of the Pope—when the King moved into the Quirinal and the Pope into the Vatican—that fight between the Vatican and modern Italy resulted in great damage to Roman Catholicism, because the patriots saw that they could not be good patriots and good Catholics, and they choose to be good patriots. Then the war broke out and the Vatican dispatched thousands and thousands of priests to the front. These priests met the common soldier. They wrote letters for him. They looked after him in a sort of Y. M. C. A. fashion. When a boy was wounded they visited him and talked with him. They came close to the ordinary soldier in a very human and sympathetic way. The result was that they revived again the influence of the church through this personal ministrations in the war. That worked well until it was discovered that the political policy of the Vatican was against the Allies and with the Central Powers.

How did it become evident? Did you read of any protest against the devastation of Belgium? That is a good Catholic country. Cardinal Mercier went down to see if he could get moral backing at Rome and they sent him back to Belgium disappointed. The Central order to do it America must put into it every ounce of her strength. Europe is depending upon America to win the war. Russia is out of it. Serbia and Rumania are out of it. Italy is staggering under this recent blow. France is past her maximum strength. England and America remain as the real offensive forces. Germany can be beaten, but I do not think she is anywhere near it now. To beat her, the Allies must muster every resource at their command and deliver a united blow.

BUT do you think that democracy is going to be safe when we raise our stars and stripes over Berlin? Will that be the end of the fight? When the military crowd steps down from the throne room will there be nothing left to do? Will democracy be won then? No! The real fight will come when the nations sheathe their swords; when the great social questions that will arise out of the war must be settled—in that critical moment democracy is to be lost or saved. Now, suppose that in that moment the church has given no thought to it, suppose it has not given the long look ahead, has not developed any new plan to meet the exigencies of the times, has not put more men on the field, erected more churches, worked out a new policy to meet the new day. Suppose that nothing has been done for that moment, that we stand there totally unprepared. What must be the result? The materialistic forces, the anarchical forces, the forces of hatred, revenge, despair, and the forces of disintegration will dominate the situation and destroy the very democracy that our sword has been drawn to save. Religion in this hour, today, needs not only to give her sons to die on the battlefields to save democracy, but with all her heart she must give her intelligence and her money to formulate a constructive program to make permanent and glorious this democracy, for which the lives of her sons have been given. It would be a crime for religion to take a narrow view and do nothing to prepare for that great social upheaval. Commercial men are laying their plans. Over in Italy they are saying that England is laying her plans for the commerce of the world, and that American business men are organizing great shipping and other material agencies to build up new industrial conditions after the war. But will these things make democracy safe? Are not those the very things that have failed to save democracy and the peace of the world in this hour? The things that will really save democracy, the soul of democracy—love, mercy, the spirit of brotherhood and of helpfulness, are we to say nothing about these, make no provision for them?

The opportunity for the work of our Collegio Monte Mario is a hundred times greater today than it was before the war, because Italy's treasury will be so depleted with the colossal cost of carrying on her part of the great conflict that there will be little left for developing its school system in anything like an adequate manner to meet the reconstruction needs. It will welcome with open arms all institutions that are equipped to carry on this great work. The eleven acres of land that we have acquired young men the most efficient training educationally, and that best adapted to the present and coming formative period, which we can work out. Our expenses since the war have been very much higher, and recently we have had to take in more homeless boys, for whom I must raise the money while here in America. But the Collegio is going on splendidly. Our older boys are all in the war. Most of the boys of seventeen are under training. Two or three were heart-broken to be rejected. Their spirit is the essence of patriotism. I want to get this new building up at the earliest possible moment and be ready for business at the close of the war. Italy is going to need us, and I have the assurance of one of the Ministers of the Cabinet that the whole attitude of the government will be one of deep sympathy and of welcome. The government wants our help in that after-the-sword fight for democracy.

Italy is more united today than she ever has been since the outbreak of the war. She went into it just as much for idealism as any other nation. There is not a sign that she went in for any selfish object.

All of our preachers of fighting age are under arms and their wives and daughters are taking their places in the pulpits. This is a radical change from the old Levantine conception of woman's sphere. Most of our church work now has been turned to war relief, and the women are carrying it on heroically.

FOR the last twenty-five or thirty years we have worked under something of a handicap in the foreign field.

America has been regarded as the nation of enormous wealth. Every time an American appeared, he was looked upon as a representative of material wealth, and to a very great extent the missionary, as he traveled abroad, carried that stamp. He could not get away from it. Everything he said and did was interpreted under a certain aspect of materialism. When America did not go into the war at first, other nationalities said, "That is the materialism of America. She will sell her soul for money." That was true not only in the Central Empires, but it was a general feeling throughout all of south Europe and other parts of the world.

When America finally entered the war, after President Wilson had exercised such patience and had made it evident that he desired the States to keep out, if possible, he gave to America the moral leadership of the world. After this, wherever the American missionary goes everything that he says or does will be interpreted with a just and fair judgment.

The President of the United States has given to missions the greatest opportunity this side of the days of Martin Luther for Protestantism. The greatest missionary in the last hundred years is Woodrow Wilson!

Bishop Nuelsen, in charge of Methodist Episcopal work in Europe leaving Venice after a conference for the new building on the Monte Mario is the last available hilltop in Rome. It stands about six or seven hundred feet above the city, just to the north of St. Peter's, and looks down on the Vatican gardens and the house where the Pope lives. It is regarded as the best site for a school in any part of Rome now. Marius camped his troops up there. The Via Triumphale runs along the side of it, and we use that road to come down into the city. We are going to put in a half million dollars' worth of the best modern equipment, with a gymnasium for one thousand young men, and we are going to give these

Suffragists Win a Victory

BY an exact two-thirds vote, 274 to 136, the nation's representatives on January 10, after five hours' debate, adopted the resolution which, if concurred in by the Senate, will place before the nation the question of universal woman suffrage. The Susan B. Anthony Amendment, as it is called, had been before the Congress for seventy long and fateful years. Little by little sentiment had changed, state after state had ended all discrimination against citizens because of sex, and the Empire State had, this year, given "the cause" a new impetus and a new basis of action, for New York reversed itself within two years, and the soldiers had voted two to one for the widened franchise. Thus suffrage came to the bar of the House with the strongest appeal and the most convincing case in its history.

It was appropriate that the "lady from Montana," Miss Rankin, should lead the fight for the amendment. She did it well. Representative James R. Mann of Illinois left a sickbed to vote for suffrage, as did Representative Sims. The Speaker was ready to vote "aye," but his vote was not needed.

The Committee on Suffrage of the House of Representatives reported the resolution favorably on January 8. As at first reported by the Judiciary Committee, the resolution had been drawn to require ratification by the states within seven years, but the suffrage committee to which the resolution had been referred omitted this restriction in returning it to the House. The House agreed to vote on the resolution on January 10. In spite of the interest aroused by the various investigations by congressional committees, the suffrage question appeared to hold the center of the stage in Congress during the first days of the reconvened session. Before the holiday recess there had been many predictions that the resolution would fail; following the recess the feeling seemed to be that it had a chance of passage, and as the days progressed its chances appeared to increase. The representatives of the Southern states, having practically declared their united opposition to the measure, were appealed to by Representative Cantrill of Kentucky, who pointed out that the Democratic control of Congress came in some degree through sittings held by members elected by feminine votes, and he warned the Southern members that in opposing Woman Suffrage they were practically voting to take away from the South its present predominating influence in the committees of Congress, ten Southern states controlling eighteen of the thirty-one chairmanships. The Republicans in Congress gave evidence of an intention to vote almost solidly for the resolution, and the opposition among the Democratic representatives soon gave signs of wavering under the pressure of political necessity, and as a result of the hearings in which women from the suffrage states brought telling evidence of feminine capacity for the duties of citizenship. As Mrs. Catt declared before the committee, they met with facts the theories of those opposed to the extension of the suffrage across the boundaries of sex. The final blow for the necessary favorable vote was given by the President on January 9, when he came out flatly in favor of the proposed amendment. A committee of congressmen which waited upon the President made the following statement: "The committee found that the President had not felt at liberty to volunteer his advice to members of Congress in this important matter, but when we sought his advice he very frankly and earnestly advised us to vote for the amendment as an act of right and justice to the women of the country and of the world." In the final vote, 104 Democrats, 165 Republicans and 5 Independents voted for the resolution, while 102 Democrats, 33 Republicans and 1 Progressive voted "No."

The text of the resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), that the following Article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Section 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provision of this article.

Woman's Suffrage recorded another victory in England on January 10, the House of Lords, that sanctuary of privilege, voting 134 to 69, to retain in the franchise bill the clause that extends the vote to women.

America Shows the Way to Peace

President Wilson's Great Speech Setting Forth Our War Aims and Peace Terms

IN an address on January 8 to both Houses of Congress President Wilson announced the terms of the United States as a basis for world-peace. The full text of his speech, which has been cabled to the press associations of Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia and South America, is given below:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS:

Once more, as repeatedly before, the spokesmen of the Central Empires have indicated their desires to discuss the objects of the war and the possible basis of a general peace. Parleys have been in progress at Brest-Litovsk between Russian representatives and representatives of the Central Powers to which the attention of all the belligerents has been invited for the purpose of ascertaining whether it may be possible to extend these parleys into a general conference with regard to terms of peace and settlement.

The Russian representatives presented not only a perfectly definite statement of the principles upon which they would be willing to conclude peace, but also an equally definite programme of the concrete application of those principles. The representatives of the Central Powers, on their part, presented an outline of settlement which, if much less definite, seemed susceptible of liberal interpretation until their specific programme of practical terms was added. That programme proposed no concessions at all, either to the sovereignty of Russia or to the preferences of the population with whose fortunes it dealt, but meant, in a word, that the Central Empires were to keep every foot of territory their armed forces had occupied—every province, every city, every point of vantage—as a permanent addition to their territories and their power. It is a reasonable conjecture that the general principles of settlement which they at first suggested originated with the more liberal statesmen of Germany and Austria, the men who have begun to feel the force of their own people's thought and purpose, while the concrete terms of actual settlement came from the military leaders who have no thought but to keep what they have got. The negotiations have been broken off. The Russian representatives were sincere and in earnest. They cannot entertain such proposals of conquest and domination.

THE whole incident is full of significance. It is also full of perplexity. With whom are the Russian representatives dealing? For whom are the representatives of the Central Empires speaking? Are they speaking for the majorities of their respective parliaments, or for the minority parties, that military and imperialistic minority which has so far dominated their whole policy and controlled the affairs of Turkey and the Balkan States, which have felt obliged to become their associates in this war? The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors and all the world has been audience, as was desired.

To whom have we been listening, then? To those who speak the spirit and intention of the resolutions of the German Reichstag of the 9th of July last, the spirit and intention of the Liberal leaders and parties of Germany, or to those who resist and defy that spirit and intention and insist upon conquest and subjugation? Or are we listening, in fact, to both, unreconciled and in open and hopeless contradiction? These are very serious and pregnant questions. Upon the answer to them depends the peace of the world.

BUT whatever the results of the parleys at Brest-Litovsk, whatever the confusions of counsel and of purpose in the utterances of the spokesmen of the Central Empires, they have again attempted to acquaint the world with their objects in the war and have again challenged their adversaries to say what their objects are and what sort of settlement they would deem just and satisfactory. There is no good reason why that challenge should not be responded to and responded to with the utmost candor. We did not wait for it. Not once but again and again we have laid our whole thought and purpose before the world, not in general terms only, but each time with sufficient definition to make it clear what sort of definitive terms of settlement must necessarily spring out of them.

Within the last week Mr. Lloyd George has spoken with admirable candor and in admirable spirit for the people and Government of Great Britain. There is no confusion of counsel among the adversaries of the Central Powers, no uncertainty of principle, no vagueness of detail. The only secrecy of counsel, the only lack of fearless frankness, the only failure to make definite statement of the objects of the war lies with Germany and her allies. The issues of life and death hang upon these definitions. No statesman who has the least conception of his responsibility ought for a moment to permit himself to continue this tragical and appalling outpouring of blood and treasure unless he is sure beyond peradventure that the objects of the vital sacrifice are part and parcel of the very life of society and that the people for whom he speaks think them right and imperative as he does.

THERE is, moreover, a voice calling for these definitions of principle and of purpose which is, it seems to me, more thrilling and more compelling than any of the many moving voices with which the troubled air of the world is filled. It is the voice of the Russian people. They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany, which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power apparently is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conception of what is right, of what is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated with a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind; and they have refused to compound their ideals or desert others that they themselves may be safe.

They call to us to say what it is that we desire, in what, if in anything, our purpose and our spirit differ from theirs; and I believe that the people of the United States would wish me to respond with utter simplicity and frankness. Whether their present leaders believe it or not, it is our heartfelt desire and hope that some way may be opened whereby we may be privileged to assist the people of Russia to attain their utmost hope of liberty and ordered peace.

IT will be our wish and purpose that the processes of peace, when they are begun, shall be absolutely open, and that they shall involve and permit henceforth no secret understandings of any kind. The day of conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants entered into in the interest of particular Governments and likely at some unlooked for moment to upset the peace of the world. It is this happy fact, now clear to the view of every public man whose thoughts do not still linger in an age that is dead and gone, which makes it possible for every nation whose purposes are consistent with justice and the peace of the world to avow now or at any other time the objects it has in view.

We entered this war because violations of right had occurred which touched us to the quick and made the life of our own people impossible unless they were corrected and the world secured once for all against their recurrence. What we demand in this war, therefore, is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in; and particularly that it be made safe for every peace loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression. All the peoples of the world are in effect partners in this interest, and for our own part we see very clearly that unless justice be done to others it will not be done to us.

THE programme of the world's peace, therefore, is our programme, and that programme, the only possible programme, as we see it, is this:

I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

IV. Adequate guarantees given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

V. A free, open minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.

VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

VII. Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored, without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

VIII. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly fifty years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

IX. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

XI. Rumania, Serbia and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea; and the relations of the several Balkan States to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guarantees of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan States should be entered into.

XII. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development, and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guarantees.

XIII. An independent Polish State should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

XIV. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small states alike.

IN regard to these essential rectifications of wrong and assertions of right, we feel ourselves to be intimate partners of all the Governments and peoples associated together against the imperialists. We cannot be separated in interest or divided in purpose. We stand together until the end.

For such arrangements and covenants we are willing to fight and to continue to fight until they are achieved; but only because we wish the right to prevail and desire a just and stable peace, such as can be secured only by removing the chief provocations to war, which this programme does remove. We have no jealousy of German greatness, and there is nothing in this programme that impairs it. We grudge her no achievement or distinction of learning or of pacific enterprise such as have made her record very bright and very enviable. We do not wish to injure her or to block in any way her legitimate influence or power. We do not wish to fight her either with arms or with hostile arrangements of trade, if she is willing to associate herself with us and the other peace-loving nations of the world in covenants of justice and law and fair dealing. We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world—the new world in which we now live—instead of a place of mastery.

NEITHER do we presume to suggest to her any alteration or modification of her institutions. But it is necessary, we must frankly say, and necessary as a preliminary to any intelligent dealings with her on our part, that we should know whom her spokesmen speak for: when they speak to us, whether for the Reichstag majority or for the military party and the men, whose creed is imperial domination.

We have spoken now surely in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question. An evident principle runs through the whole programme I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made its foundation no part of the structure of international justice can stand. The people of the United States could act upon no other principle, and to the vindication of this principle they are ready to devote their lives, their honor and everything that they possess. The moral climax of this, the culminating and final war for human liberty, has come and they are ready to put their own strength, their own highest purpose, their own integrity and devotion to the test.

IN all of the Allied countries this address of President Wilson, coming as it did on the heels of Lloyd George's speech to British labor, was hailed as a final, clear and just statement of the minimum requirements of a democratic safe and lasting peace. British labor leaders, convinced by Lloyd George that we war for no capitalistic or imperial aims, were further assured by the President's list of the things we fight for. France found assurance that her one basis for peace was shared by her allies. The sympathetic references to Russia did not go unnoticed, and Italy gained new determination to fight on. Some British editors were inclined to stumble over the proposal for free seas, but otherwise there was one harmonious note of praise from Allied and neutral press. It was hardly to be expected that the heavily censored German press would receive the address enthusiastically; to them Wilson appears a demagogue and a Czar.

A Week in the World's News

The Russo-German Peace Conference

THE peace conference between Russia and the Central Powers at Brest-Litovsk, which adjourned December 26 in order to afford the Entente Allies opportunity to signify if they wished to participate with Russia, was resumed on January 8.

A Russian demand that the conference be transferred to neutral territory, preferably Stockholm, was not agreed to by the Teutonic delegates, and the conference proceeded at Brest-Litovsk.

The German delegation in Petrograd, which is discussing with the Russian such questions as the resumption of commercial relations and the exchange of certain classes of prisoners, is reported to have expressed the desire to the Swedish legation that Sweden act as the mediator with Great Britain, France and Italy.

"War between Russia and Bulgaria ceases. Diplomatic and economic relations between Russia and Bulgaria are resumed. Russia recognizes Bulgaria's right to nominate a delegate to an international Danube commission. The first peace is thus concluded, with the consent of Bulgaria's allies." This announcement was made on January 10 by Bulgarian Premier Radoslavoff in parliament. News reports add that Bulgaria has appointed a minister to Petrograd and a consul-general to be stationed at Odessa, and has ordered the resumption of navigation to Odessa.

Bulgaria took part with Germany, Austria, and Turkey in the first negotiations at Brest-Litovsk, and it had been assumed that no peace terms would be agreed to by the Central Powers except in concert.

Separate peace proposals made by Turkey have been refused by the Bolshevik government. Turkey was requested to participate in the general conference between Russia and the Central Powers. Among the terms proposed by Turkey were free passage of the Dardanelles for Russian ships, Russian evacuation of Turkish territory, and demobilization of the Russian Black Sea fleet. Turkey was to retain her active army in consequence of continuation of war against the Entente. On January 11, owing to the failure of all enemy powers to accept the basis of peace proposed at Brest-Litovsk, Dr. von Kuchlinann, the head of the German delegation, announced that the Central Powers would withdraw their offer to conclude peace on the basis of "no annexation and no punitive indemnities." The Ukrainian delegation also announced the establishment of a people's republic in the Ukraine, resuming the national existence lost 250 years ago. They declared that the Ukraine was striving for the formation of a federal government in Russia, pending, which it would act independently.

Meantime reports tell of renewed preparations for fighting by the Russian armies, of the formation of a Cossack republic under Kaledines in the Don region and of serious mutinies among the German troops at Kovno and Tarnopol.

OUR GROWING ARMY. Before the Senate Military Affairs Committee on January 10, Secretary of War Newton D. Baker answered criticisms of the War Department. A substantial army is already in France, he said, where men and officers have been trained and are ready for active service. The army is supplied with rifles and powder, and ordnance is being made as fast as the factories can do the work. The shortage in clothing has been made good. No army of similar size had ever been raised, equipped and trained in so short a time, nor had such provision ever been made for the soldier's well-being. In April, 1917, said Mr. Baker, the regular army comprised

5,571 officers and 121,797 men; the National Guard in Federal service, 3,733 officers and 76,713 men; the Reserve, 4,000 men. At that time 2,573 officers were in the reserve on inactive duty. On December 31, 1917, the regular army had 10,250 officers and 475,000 men, the National Guard 10,031 officers and 400,900 men, the National Army 480,000 men, and the Reserve 84,575 officers and 72,750 men; an increase from 9,324 to 110,835 officers and from 202,510 to 1,428,650 men. The aviation division of the Signal Corps on April 1 had 65 officers and 1,120 men, while on January 1 it had 3,900 officers and 82,120 men. The army now is about six times as great as in the Spanish eastern ports on January 10. The delivery of bunker coal to these vessels was carried on industriously every day during the week, and a large number of the delayed liners were enabled to begin their voyages. On January 7 Fuel Administrator Garfield issued an order curtailing the export of coal until domestic needs were met.

UNLOADING WEEK. As a part of the plan to make more effective use of railway equipment Director General McAdoo issued an order on January 6 providing for greatly increased demurrage rates on cars not promptly unloaded, the new rates to take effect January 21. On January 7 plans were announced for a war. The health of the soldiers in our sixteen training camps, which have all necessary conveniences, comforts, and safeguards for the men, is better than that of any similar number of men in our history. The death rate, 7.5 per thousand, is slightly less than that of men of the same age at home. In the Spanish war it was three times as great. Mr. Baker said that deliveries of machine-guns would begin in February, but that while every man sent abroad would be fully equipped, it would be some big nation-wide campaign beginning January 14 to clear up congestion at all railroad terminals, the week beginning on that date to be known as "Freight-Moving Week."

TO HOUSE SHIPWORKERS. Homer L. Ferguson, president and general manager of the Newport News Shipbuilding Company, declared before the investigating committee of the Senate on January 8 that the government program of 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 tons of shipping Congress passed a bill now pending providing the money for the purpose. Chairman Hurley of the Shipping Board replied to Mr. Ferguson on the following day. He quoted Lloyds estimate of the capacity of American yards at 4,500,000 to 5,000,000 tons and declared that the higher figure would be reached. He stated that a campaign was on to secure 382,000 more workers for the shipyards.

FACING SACRIFICE. It was announced on January 10 that because of ship losses and of crop failures abroad it would be necessary to ship an additional 90,000,000 bushels of wheat to our Allies. As our entire exportable surplus is already shipped, this means that Americans must loyally save on wheat products at every possible point where a substitute is available. Power is soon to be given to the Food Administration to effect by authority what they have thus far sought to accomplish by suggestion. Wheatless meals and days can then be made uniform in all public eating-places. Greater exports of meat must also shortly be made available.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Supreme Court of the United States of January 7 unanimously upheld the selective conscription law, the constitutionality of which had been questioned in several cases before the court. . . . Earl Reading, Lord Chief Justice of England, has been appointed British High Commissioner to the United States. He will take over the work of the embassy and of the war mission. . . . Earthquake shocks on January 3 and 4 completed the destruction of Guatemala City, which was reported on January 5 to be entirely wiped out, while steam was coming up through crevices in the streets. . . . It is estimated that 7,000,000 American citizens will this year have the privilege of paying an income tax. . . . Circumstantial reports leaking through various neutral sources contiguous to Germany indicate that there is much suffering throughout the Empire, that food is scarce and that millions of the poorer classes are insufficiently fed, that new clothing and shoes are almost unobtainable, that the people are indulging in food riots and that the authorities are losing their hold upon the nation. . . . The American Red Cross reported, on January 10, that its membership had been increased, since May 10, from 486,394 to 22,000,000. The total of subscriptions to the Red Cross war fund was $103,525,955.64.

The War in Europe

THE fighters in Europe were snow-bound this week over almost all of the front, from the sea in Belgium to the Piave in Italy. Heavy snow fell in the Italian Alps and seriously impeded German communications, preventing any aggressive action, although the rival artilleries here and everywhere else kept up their reciprocal destruction. In France and Flanders artillery fire by day and trench raids at night marked the week, the most important being made by the Germans and English east of Ypres and on the Cambrai front, honors being about even, and by the French east of St. Mihiel, where nearly a mile of German front line was wrecked and prisoners and machine guns were taken. On the Italian front, English troops executed several successful raids across the Piave River, destroying Austrian positions and stores and returning with prisoners and spoils.

During the week ending January 9 submarines and mines again accounted for twenty-one British ships, eighteen of which were of 1,600 tons. The American steamship Harry Luckenbach was torpedoed with a loss of eight of her crew.

The British army in 1917 took prisoners 114,000 men and captured 781 guns and lost 28,379 men as prisoners, and 166 guns.

Japan's Message to Christian America

MAJOR GENERAL HIBIKI of the Japanese Army is in America on an important mission. He doesn't seek guns, or ship plates, or commerce; but, as the representative of Japan's 200,000 Christians, his quest is for spiritual things. Next week Miss Sangster will bring to you General Hibiki's message to the Christians of America.

What are the factors in the fight? Multiply your ideas by four and subtract the result from the mysteries of Providence. Then listen to the message that Rev. Ira Dwight Lytle brings to the Christian Herald pulpit.

Frank Carpenter has gotten his hands into the nation's wool, but he got one of them free enough to spin an interesting yarn in next week's Herald.

Then there will be more tales of neighborly, a story of men remade, and a request from Uncle Sam for more eyes for the navy.

time before all of the troops at home would be completely outfitted.

STRAIGHTENING THE COAL TANGLE. Aided by better weather, railways and port authorities at New York and New England points made some progress during the week ending January 12 in relieving the acute situation in the coal market, although the total coal available was below minimum requirements. 150 vessels with cargoes for Europe were detained for lack of fuel. Because of lack of bunker coal which had delayed sailings and because of shortage of tonnage, 40,000 ear-loads of materials vitally necessary to our troops abroad and to our allies were being held at launched in 1918 might be reduced to 3,000,000 tons or increased to 10,000,000 and would surely not be greater than the lesser figure unless houses were built near the yards to provide living-quarters for the necessary labor. He said if he had the power he would commandeer houses, but that it was useless to talk of working two or three shifts a day unless living-quarters were provided. On January 9 the Shipping Board, stimulated by a report from the Senate sub-committee, announced that it would expend immediately $1,200,000 to provide housing accommodations for shipyard workers at Newport News, and that similar construction would be undertaken at other plants as soon as

The President on World-Peace

PRESIDENT WILSON, in his address of January 8, expressed in dignified and felicitous terms the heart-desire of the American people. It is broad, humanitarian, statesmanlike, and is beyond question the most notable deliverance that has ever come from any President of this nation. Yet, with all its dignity and precision of statement, it is simplicity itself. Moreover, it is an appeal not only to the peoples of Germany and Austria, but to all the peoples of the world, in behalf of humanity and justice. He writes as the champion of the weak against an oppression which in some instances has become as galling as the helotism of ancient Greece. He shows America in the rôle of a world-liberator, and his attitude should find a warm response in all lands.

It is evident that the President regarded the time as opportune for such a restatement of the American attitude as would impress all the nations involved in the war, and possibly aid them in reaching a solution of the peace problem. In his address he begins by contrasting the statements of principles and terms submitted at Brest-Litovsk. Both were clear and definite, he points out, but that of the Central Powers proposed no concessions whatsoever. Earlier proposals which originated with the liberal statesmen of Austria and Germany had clearly been disregarded by the military leaders of those countries, who had no thought of surrendering conquered territory; hence the failure of the negotiations. He gives the Russian negotiators full credit for sincerity and earnestness, while the representatives of the Central Empires spoke not for their peoples, but for the imperialistic minority alone. Accepting the utterances of the German and Austrian spokesmen at the conference as a challenge to the Allies to declare to the world their war aims, and their views of a peace settlement, the President, although he has done so before, sees no reason why he should not do so again. So he accepts the challenge. He hears the voice of prostrate Russia calling, and he believes that our own people desire that he should respond "with utter simplicity and frankness."

In this generous spirit the address discusses the processes of peace. It is the desire of the American people, he tells the Congress, that these processes shall be absolutely open, and that there should be no secret understandings. His language at this point is simple and conclusive. "The day of conquest and aggrandizement," he reminds them, "is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants, entered into in the interest of particular governments, and likely at some unlooked for moment to upset the peace of the world. It is this happy fact, now clear to the view of every public man whose thoughts do not still linger in an age that is dead and gone, which makes it possible for every nation whose purposes are consistent with justice and the peace of the world to avow now or at any other time the objects it has in view."

The President then sets forth anew the purposes of the United States in entering the war and our demand that the world be made "a fit and safe place to live in; and particularly that it may be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world, as against force and selfish aggression."

On another page of this issue we give the full text of the address, including "the only possible program, as we see it," for bringing about world-peace.

There is remarkable similarity of views in all essentials between these terms and those recently outlined by Premier Lloyd George. Indeed, as the President explains, "we feel ourselves to be intimate partners of all the governments and peoples associated together against the imperialists. We cannot be separated in interest or divided in purpose. We stand together until the end."

He defines our attitude toward Germany in language that corrects any false impressions. Speaking for the whole people, he disavows all jealousy of German greatness or hostility in the arrangements of trade. "We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world—the new world in which we now live—instead of a place of mastery. There is no purpose of suggesting any alteration or modification of German institutions, but her people should be heard through their spokesmen, instead of through the men whose creed is imperial domination."

Our own people will read the address with the growing conviction that President Wilson has measured up to the stature of national leadership at a time of world-crisis when real leaders are needed. He has translated the vision and the hope of good men everywhere into simple, practical language, which all may understand, and he has uplifted the whole subject to a plane far higher than that of diplomacy, and which holds out the promise of realization of the universal hope of world-peace.

The Prohibition Procession Starts

MISSISSIPPI takes the place of honor as the first in line for National Prohibition. Her vote ratifying the Constitutional amendment passed both houses of her Legislature within fifteen minutes after the measure was introduced by Governor Bilbo's message, and with only eight dissenting votes.

It is a peculiarly good start of the procession of the states. The South fittingly leads in Prohibition because it has most acutely felt the need of it. A community that has best known the evils and disasters of liquor drinking in the past is quickest and most eager to stamp out those evils for all the states and for all time.

Other states will promptly follow. As the sentiment of the country is sounded there is found more and more indication that the goal set by W. J. Bryan—three-fourths of all the states in line within three years—will be attained. Whether the government decrees temporary war Prohibition or not, the people are going to decree permanent Prohibition for peace.

Your Delayed Paper

AGAIN we have occasion to refer to the unavoidable delays in the delivery of the Christian Herald to its readers through the mails. As we explained last week, all publications are experiencing the same trouble. It lies not with the publications themselves, for they are mailed at the usual time, nor with the postal authorities, but with the railways, whose transportation facilities have been very largely taken over temporarily to relieve the coal shortage, which is still a grave menace to the health and life of multitudes. To meet the imperative need of giving coal the right of way until the fuel famine was relieved, hundreds of passenger and other trains were taken off by the transportation companies, and the mails, all except first-class matter, became congested at the starting-point. Every Eastern publication has suffered from this delay in the same degree as the Christian Herald. The trouble is not only unfortunate but wholly unprecedented. As we go to press with this issue of the Christian Herald we can report that conditions are much improved, and we hope that regular deliveries will be made as usual and that our readers will again receive their papers on time. Nevertheless, we ask all Christian Herald readers to be patient if each issue does not arrive exactly on the date of issue, as in all probability there may again be similar delays in transportation over which we have no control. Wait at least a few days before complaining.

We feel that this explanation is due to all of our subscribers, and while we deeply regret the inconvenience and disappointment the situation has caused to them we, in common with the whole body of publishers, can do no more than state the facts, which speak for themselves.

The Third Liberty Loan

THE third Liberty Loan, which will probably be offered in March, will exceed in amount not only the two preceding Liberty Loans, but any single war loan or any other loan ever offered in the history of the world. This announcement is made on the authority of the Liberty Loan Committee. These provisions, however, are subject to such change as the rapidly changing conditions of war may warrant. The committee's notification further says: "No loan of such proportions can be successfully absorbed unless the entire nation responds to the offering, and unless every citizen prides himself on the practice of self-denial, that he may subscribe to the limit of his ability. The number of subscribers to the last loan has been estimated at 10,000,000. Proportionally for the new loan it must exceed 15,000,000."

In preparing for the successful floating of this new loan, every true American should make "Thrift" the patriot's watchword. It will be well for us to put luxuries and extravagance completely aside and to meet the new call upon our loyalty with Spartan-like self-denial, that the nation may be able to continue its war duties unhampered, and that our boys "over there," who are fighting to save the world for democracy, may be equipped and fed properly. When we think of what they are facing at the front, we should not hesitate to make any or all of the comparatively simple sacrifices that the nation demands of us. We should be willing to cut out fashion and all foolish expenditures, and to limit our requirements to our actual needs, no more and no less. Our diet should be cut down to the wholesome essentials. We can save in many ways, in order that we may give to our country the full support which all loyal Americans should delight to render at such a time as this.

We are in this war, and we have already begun to realize that the "business as usual" stage of thought and action is impracticable under our new conditions. "Every unessential industry which burns coal," the Liberty Loan Committee reminds us by way of illustration, "deprives the essential industries by just so much of the supply available for their purposes. So does every housewife who burns an unnecessary hoddie in her kitchen range. Every man who buys a new overcoat is bidding against Uncle Sam, who is buying overcoats for our soldiers. And every dollar spent on a luxury is helping to support an unessential industry in the competitive consumption of essentials. Money spent on Liberty Bonds gets as wide and as immediate circulation as that spent on candy or theater tickets, but it goes to support industries which produce those things the government needs."

This war, as far as America is concerned, must be waged entirely on present savings. Hence the imperative necessity of thrift on the part of all the people. Those who have been in the habit of spending the income from past savings should realize it to be their duty in the present situation to practice self-denial and turn over what they can of their private incomes to the government in the form of Liberty Bond investments.

When the new Liberty Loan bonds are issued a few weeks hence, we trust that the members of the Christian Herald Family Circle in every State will be ready to help to the full extent of their ability, by taking up the bonds. Not only are they the best of all investments in a purely monetary sense, but they are the sinews of war with which Uncle Sam proposes to "see it through" in behalf of righteousness and justice. And in the years to come every home whose members have helped to win the war by buying some of these bonds will look back with satisfaction such as nothing else can give, upon the time when they saved and economized and made personal sacrifice to help the President and the nation at the critical period when the great war threatened to overturn the world, and to make freedom a byword and justice a pitiful memory.

The Coal Stringency

THE war has created a demand upon the United States for 100,000,000 more tons of coal this year than is normally produced. Because of car shortage and the congested condition of the railroads, it is going to be impossible to increase the supply more than 50,000,000 tons. The remaining gap of 50,000,000 tons must be filled in by conservation in the homes and industrial plants of America. These facts come from the Fuel Administration.

The country is short on transportation facilities. The carrying of the 30,000,000 carloads of coal mined last year constituted more than half of all the freight carried by the railroads. When to this is added the explanation that the railroads themselves used in their locomotives last year between 125,000,000 and 135,000,000 tons of coal, and that they will this year require for their use 175,000,000 tons, it is seen that the hauling of coal is a burdensome task. The transportation of coal alone uses up 30 per cent. of the entire railroad equipment of the United States.

Government control of the railroads may greatly help the situation. In many cases industrial concerns have voluntarily cut down their use of coal; in many other cases curtailment will be forced. Non-essential industries are to be limited in their supply. The way to prevent the losses incident upon limitation of industry is for every consumer of coal to cut off waste and unnecessary consumption with an iron hand, and start on an intensive course of conservation without delay.

It is estimated that if every householder will save one shovelful of coal a day the aggregate will be 15,000,000 tons a year. This is small hardship and enormous gain. Those who can relieve the coal shortage by burning wood can figure that two pounds of seasoned wood have a fuel value equal to one pound of coal, according to a Forest Service bulletin. While different kinds of wood have different fuel values, the foresters say that in general the greater the dry weight of a non-resinous wood the more heat it will give out. For such species as hickory, oak, beech, birch, hard maple, ash, locust, long-leaf pine, or cherry, which have comparatively high fuel values, one cord, weighing about 4,000 pounds, will equal one ton of coal.

The Trial of Our Faith

TEXT—I Peter 1:7. "That the trial of your faith might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."

THE first two chapters of this Epistle mention three precious things: "Unto you who believe He is precious"; "the precious blood of Christ"; and "the precious trial of your faith." All these precious things logically include another precious thing, namely, our faith. It is needless to argue the preciousness of Christian faith, that is to say, its value, the high esteem in which it should be held. Now let us think of the precious trying of our faith.

The world is full of things which try our faith, experiences which test it, strain it up to the very point of breaking. They found it so to whom the apostle first wrote, and we find it so, to whom, after all, as well as to those early Christians "scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia," he wrote these words.

If the purpose of God in ordaining this world and this life of ours had been to produce happiness, his purpose were indeed a failure. But if his intention had been and is to try our faith, then the world is admirably adapted to its purpose. Innumerable circumstances, ordinary and extraordinary, try our faith. "The natural perversity of inanimate things" tries it. The weakness of the flesh tries it. Adversity and poverty alike, fullness of vitality and deficient vitality, our tasks and our temptations—temptations of the flesh and of the spirit—try our faith. The close relationship of our spirits and the bodies in which they dwell, with all necessary bodily limitations, tries our faith. Our souls are like ocean-going boats, tossed by waves, buffeted by tempests, and beaten back by contrary winds. Thus the seaworthiness of a boat is tried, and thus the strength of our faith is tested. Is it sad that this is so? We may think of it as tragedy, but the apostle did not so think of it. He was given to see the fruit of the trial of our faith, and in view of that he called it precious. What is the possible ultimate result of the trying of our faith in view of which the painful discipline to which we are subjected may be regarded as precious?

THE trial of our faith is precious if it give us a sense of possessing something which can not be lost. Many of our most highly valued possessions may be alienated. Like soldiers on a forced march, we deliberately cast away one thing after another of our impedimenta, and reach the end of the journey with only that remaining which we could not lose without losing life itself. How easily riches "make wings and fly away"! How imperceptibly youth, health and strength vanish! Much that is dear to us is as a vapor that appeareth for a moment and then vanisheth away. At the end of the journey, when we take inventory of our assets, if we find, like Paul, that we have kept the faith, whatever other things have been forfeited, we shall not be bankrupt or castaway.

Then the trying of our faith is precious by so much as it gives us a consciousness of fellowship with all similar sufferers. There is a freemasonry of sorrow. The widowed Queen of England, after the death of her Prince Consort, found relief by visiting the widow of a workingman who had lost his life in an accident. At their first meeting no words were exchanged for a moment, but the two women in black embraced each other and wept together. There is a tomb in Westminster Abbey marking the resting-place of a babe that died two hundred years ago. (What must it be to have been in heaven two centuries?) The tomb is in the form of a marble cradle with delicate lacelike tracery, and in the cradle is the marble effigy of a sleeping babe. Some woman with rare insight into the fellowship of suffering wrote, at sight of the cradle tomb:

Man dies, but sorrow never dies;
The corroding years divide in vain,
And the whole world is knit by ties
Of common brotherhood in pain.

IT has been said that "humanity is distinct like the billows, yet one like the sea." The oneness of humanity, the kinship of all pilgrims of the night, is best revealed in the experiences which try our faith. Every public speaker knows this is true, and perceives instinctively that an audience is never so firmly welded together, that a congregation never so thinks as one and feels as one, as when hearts are touched to sympathy and eyes are moist with tears.

In the freshness of one's grief, he may imagine himself alone; but let a little time go by, and he finds himself not solitary, but walking a companioned way, unnumbered brethren at his side. Aristocracy melts into democracy in the fire of a common affliction. Not long ago a distinguished lawyer said good-by to the dear woman who had walked at his side for more than forty years. Shortly after the funeral, as he entered the building in which he has his office, the janitor with whom he had exchanged casual greetings through the years stopped him and took his hand and expressed, as rough, uncultured men sometimes do with intuitive grace, a few words of sympathy, so simple and so sincere that they were as balm to the broken heart. The brotherhood of sorrow leaps barriers of caste and indeed bridges the chasm of time itself. How many fathers there are who have had fellowship with David when he wept the loss of his little lad! How many blind people there are who have had fellowship with Homer and Milton! How many burdened men and women have found it easier to call Jesus Christ their Brother as they, like him, staggered under the weight of their crosses up to their mountain peaks of agony!

BUT these mountain peaks of agony which lie at the end of the trying of our faith may also be mountain peaks of vision. The trial of our faith is precious if it bring us in our suffering a sense of spiritual freedom. A heroic woman, engaged in the preaching of a great reform, a movement she believed to be fundamentally moral as well as social, suffered much ridicule and scorn. These she bore bravely, but shrank from a possible experience of imprisonment. That cup she prayed might pass. But there came a day when it was pressed to her lips. She was arrested and thrown into prison, into a common cell with women of the underworld. At first she shrank from contact with them; but she remained in prison long enough to know that their touch was human and friendly. And even while in prison, there came to her a sense of emancipation from fear. Having suffered imprisonment, she felt there was nothing worse to suffer. She had drained the cup to its dregs. When she came out of prison she was far bolder, far freer from the invisible fetters which hitherto had bound her. The experience was worth all its cost.

There are trials of our faith which have the same effect on us as imprisonment had on this woman. In some such spirit as this, the shepherd lad who had slain a lion went out to meet the giant Philistine. Then, having slain Goliath, fear itself was slain. There is a line in a poem which hints at the Christian's conquest of fear:

"And, death once dead, there's no more death to die!"

The Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of the emancipation accomplished by Him "who, through death, delivers them who through fear of death have all their lifetime been subject to bondage."

In view of this threefold fruitage of the trial of our faith, is it not clear why our trials are precious? The same man who wrote of the precious trying of our faith wrote also: "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy."

JERUSALEM OUT OF BONDAGE

THE Holy City, like a prayer-rug placed Upon the hot sands of the desert way,
Is swept clean of its ages-old decay,
With blots of blood and ancient blemishes erased.
And once again the humble ones may come,
And kneel there, undisturbed, alone;
May bow in prayer, with never sword nor drum
To beat across the threshold of their hearts;
And through the gray and honored marts
New Harps of Happiness shall hum.

When winds are calm and pattering feet have ceased,
Dead centuries sound faintly on the ear.
As if God wanted those about to hear
The songs of stars that still burn brightly in the East!
And there are sermons, murmuring, now and then,
That glow with grave-dust of the Past:
Dead words, new-born, of wise and holy men
Echo, as if from lips that lately passed,
And these fair, sloping hills are massed
With olive trees that bloom again!

In reverence the Moloch War sweeps by,
The hush of sudden terror in his soul.
Here, only warriors of Christ take toll,
And altar-fires burn upward to the desert sky.
A dim oasis, on the sands of strife—
A little realm of crumbling clay,
Where Time has hid her treasure-trove of prayer,
It is a miracle that this shall stand.
Unmarred, by desecrating hand,
They must have known that He was there!

The Pattern in the Mount

SUNDAY, January 27. Heb. 8:5. "See that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount." That is the secret of all progress. An ugly fact is seen in the light of its ideal, and the work of reform is begun. Some man has seen the pattern in the mount, and he brings the glowing rectitude and places it side by side with familiar realities, and he exposes their crookedness and fatal alienation. "Repent," he cries, and in obedience to his word and vision a revolution is born. It is when the pattern in the mount is lost, or when it has been forgotten, or when we have deliberately hid it away, that we fall into an indolent contentment. When the shining, convicting pattern is missing we become "at ease in Zion," and foul and ugly things are undisturbed. Crooked happenings do not distress us. Nay, they appear as the quite natural and companionable furniture of our lives. Wronged people do not arrest or alarm us, because we do not see their angels as in the presence of our Father in heaven. We must see the heavenly pattern if we would see the earthly perversion of our Father's will.

If therefore we would have a period of wise revolution we must have a preparatory period of wise revelation. All healthy revolution in spirit and in circumstances, in character and in conduct, must begin in the glory of spiritual vision. "Where there is no vision the people perish." But where the vision is given and welcomed there will be the health of disquietude, and we shall begin to have the stirrings of a new day in movements of desire and will, and in the awakening energies of agitation and action.

And what is to be our pattern in the mount except the holy mind of Jesus Christ? If in all matters of right and wrong, matters of moral principle, we seek the mind of Christ, we shall surely have before us the pattern in the mount. What does Christ think about the poor? What does he think about their rights? What is his pattern for holy dealing? And has he any pattern for marriage? And what is the ideal in glory concerning the purposed stature of every man? And what is his ideal as to the relation of races, the fellowship of all the tribes and peoples which jostle one another on the planet? And so with countless other questions which we might ask in the holy mount. We should find that the patterns would be given.

Sometimes the patterns are given to us with amazing brilliancy. Sometimes a pattern is made to blaze in the soul of some man or woman in lines of fire. It burns in the very texture of their being, and it kindles their awakened spirit into vehement speech and action. These are our prophets. They can say with Jeremiah, "There is in mine heart as it were a burning fire . . . and I cannot contain!" Their eyes have seen "the dawning of the glory of the Lord." They have received the pattern in the mount, and they dare not be disobedient to the heavenly vision. And that is the first necessity of our day, to seek the pattern in the mount. J. H. J.

The Recognition of Spirituality

MONDAY, January 28. Gen. 41:38. "And Pharaoh said unto his servants, Can we find such a man as this is, a man in whom the Spirit of God is?" Pharaoh was not himself a man of God, but he recognized Joseph as such when he came to know him. Even the unbelieving world recognizes a godly man when it sees him. He was not a good man who said, "Let me live the life of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." We are not surprised to read that the sons of the prophets, when they saw Elisha, perceived that the spirit of Elijah rested upon him. The sons of the prophets were religious men, and if there is anything in religion we must believe that God gives a religious man a spirit of discernment. But here, in the case of Pharaoh and Joseph, we find a man who makes no pretensions of being spiritual, giving prompt recognition to a spiritual man as his superior. One of the best things about this world is the capacity of the non-religious and even of the irreligious to perceive the superiority, the dignity and merit, the invaluable worth of a religious man. After all, a man is known by his spirit. It takes more than a tailor and a bootmaker to make a man. They may make a manikin, but a man is something more than an automaton. A man is great or small, generous or mean, virtuous or vicious, an asset to society or a liability, according to his spirit. And one "in whom the Spirit of God dwells" is essentially great. He has great aims, great purposes and great motives, limited only by the length and breadth of eternal life. C. C. A.

Mercy and Love

TUESDAY, January 29. Rom. 5:10. "If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." It is remarkable how persistently the earliest preachers of Christianity urge the atoning character of the death of Christ, and how they relate the personal Christianity of every believer to this event. Through it we have become free from guilt in the sight of God; from it we derive every energy that is exerted in our Christian life; upon it we base our hope of our final and perfect salvation in heaven after this life shall have been ended.

At this place in Romans, beginning even several verses before, the apostle uses the death of Christ for a climactic argument, to beget greater assurance in Christians. Christ died for men at a time when they were still his enemies. By making his Son the expiatory sacrifice for the world's guilt God gave men the very strongest proof of his love. He did not look for worthiness and merit in them before surrendering Christ to death. The atonement which Christ effected extended even to the wicked people who caused his death, and to all others elsewhere who had not even heard of him and who were living in defiance of God. If God can show such love to unbelievers and people who oppose him, how much greater will his affection be for people who have come to a knowledge of their sin and misery, are heartily sorry for their former wickedness, have accepted the reconciliation which his Son effected, and sincerely love Christ? The Eternal Throne

WEDNESDAY, January 30. Ps. 45:6. "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." The nationalities of earth are to help build characters for the kingdom of God. They are only temporary, while the throne of God is eternal. In this work of building, the nation is for the protection of the home, the business life, the school, the property, the life, liberty and pursuit of happiness of the individual. The republic gives freedom of thought, of speech, of publication, of worship, and the privilege of obeying the higher government of the Almighty.

The pillars of truth on which good government is founded are continuous in the support of the throne of God. Law and penalty, two of these shining shafts, must be kept in their places, or the temple falls. The Sermon on the Mount was for the regulation of individual life between man and man, but nations must enforce law and administer penalties, as a miniature of God's execution of justice and righteousness. Power, physical, mental and spiritual, belongeth unto God, and is delegated to earthly government, to use in defense of the right.

The river of life of all true earthly government flows from underneath the heavenly throne. It blesses everything whither the river cometh and beareth on its bosom immortals to the wider, grander sea shining before the throne of God. It is there that the voyagers finally sing, "Blessing and honor and power and glory be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne forever and ever." E. W. C.

Able to Keep

THURSDAY, January 31. II Tim. 1:12. "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." "That which I have committed unto him" is literally that which has been deposited in his care. What kind of a "deposit" had the apostle made? What is included in that which I have committed? The words of another apostle answer this question. It is Peter who speaks of "committing the keeping of our souls to God in well-doing as unto a faithful Creator." If there had been savings banks in Paul's day, some form of the same word which he uses for "commit" would probably have been used to describe the act by which a depositor entrusts to the bank the keeping of his money.

The word for keep is a military word, and it implies sleepless vigilance, unfailing guardianship. So God would fortify our faith in his keepership. What we have committed to him is in no jeopardy. It is absolutely safe. He never failed one of his children, and he never will. Therefore what we commit to him need never be withdrawn. Wars and panics do not affect its safety. And what do we commit to him? Exactly what Paul committed. Health, life, temporal and eternal good, reputation, hope, all. Paul had enemies, and he committed them to God. That is the best way to deal with our enemies if we have any. Paul had friends, and he committed them to God. He had fears, and thus he got rid of them. He had burdens he could not bear, and thus they grew light. Dark days came to him, cold days, bleak days, but never a black day, for he had committed his days to God. Like the Psalmist, he could say, "My times are in thy hand." "That day" is the day of Jesus Christ, the day of his victory over all things. That day is coming, and all we have deposited with God, all of treasure, all of friendship, all of hope deferred, shall be returned to us with infinite interest. C. C. A.

Divine Healing

FRIDAY, February 1. Isa. 53:5. "With his stripes we are healed." The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah has attracted men in very early times. Peter echoes this text in particular in the New Testament (I Peter 2:24). We are told that the Ethiopian was reading this chapter when Philip met him (Acts 8). Jeremiah may have read it: he first pronounces the wounds and bruises of Israel incurable, namely, by ordinary medicines, and then declares, in the name of God: "I will heal thee of thy wounds" (Jer. 30). This is a splendid metaphor: the wounds and blood of Jesus compared to a healing balm for the world's grievous sores.

To appreciate this beautiful figure, we must be conscious, first of all, of our malady and acknowledge that we are in a sore plight. No one wants a physician who regards himself as being in good health. False shame sometimes causes people to dissemble their sickness and conceal their wounds. That is a very dangerous procedure; such a delusion may prove fatal. Let us honor God by believing that he speaks the truth when he declares all men mortally ill, and let us gladly take of the medicine which he has prepared for us. We are healed by the wounds of Jesus. How? He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows. He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities. Our sins were laid upon him and permitted to carry on their ravages upon him. Accordingly, they are taken from us. The cause of our misery has been removed; the fountain of our diseases has been stopped. Now the healing process may begin. We are to become sound again in our inward life. The wounds of our conscience are to close. Our habitual sins, which are like festering sores, are to disappear. This is to be accomplished by our taking refuge in the wounds of Jesus. W. H. T. D.

Singing of the Soul

SATURDAY, February 2. Eph. 5:19. "Singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord." Christianity was born amid the songs of angels, and Jesus sang on his way to Gethsemane, two great extremes in his life. Music is God's universal language of love to mankind. It comes to us free from denominational influences, creeds or doctrines, and free from the wings of words.

Music and poetry are called twin sisters; the words more fully conveying the thought of God, while music awakens the melody of holy emotion. Unbelief never sings, for the wings of faith and hope are clipped. The lark only sings on rising toward the heavens.

The harp of the soul is in the heart, therefore the heart must be right with God to offer praise in tune with the Infinite. We must make melody in our hearts unto the Lord. Artistic music thrills the intellect, but praise rises like incense from the bosom of loving devotion and consecration. The Holy Spirit puts a new song into the mouth, of harmony and unison with the heavenly Father. The new birth needs a new song appropriate to redemption. Some soul harps require a new tuning to bring them up to the concert pitch of highest praise. Let the Master Musician put on the keys of trouble and trial that you may again break forth into song, singing like the Psalmist, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits." E. W. Armenia Enters the World-War

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

Received January 2, 1918, through the American Diplomatic Mail Uncensored

Tiflis, the Georgian Capital and the base of the Russian army in the Caucasus

THE permission which has just been granted to the Georgians and Armenians to raise fifty thousand national troops for use on the Caucasian front may produce remarkable effects on the battlefields where the fight for the Near East is being carried on. The Caucasian front has been the center for much intriguing, the result of which might have made the defense of Verdun as futile as it was picturesque. With characteristic thoroughness, Germany has played the whole game, without any paralyzing obsession in regard to the importance of a single battle-line. Today the Caucasian front is second to none in importance, for it means the success or failure of Germany's greatest dream, the fight for a trade route between the producing centers of Europe and the population centers of Asia. Two years ago, while in America, I asserted in an article in the Christian Herald that the "Drang nach Osten" was one of the major causes of the European war. And now, from a point behind the Caucasian front, it still seems possible that the decisive battle of the war may be fought in Turkey.

The Russian troops south of the Caucasus are utterly demoralized. Many of them are selling their boots to get money for raw alcohol. The Turks know perfectly well that their adversaries are worthless. But for the present, they do not care to inaugurate an offensive. If the Turkish offensive gets under way before the Georgian and Armenian national armies do, the results may be disastrous to the Allied cause. If the Turks can be driven back and a union made between General Maude's Mesopotamian army and the fresh troops from the Caucasus, the Turks can be surrounded and the German dream of a land route to the East finally shattered. A winter campaign is possible, and the absence of elaborate trench systems makes fortune favor the bolder attack to an extent that is impossible on the western front. Regarded by many as an insignificant battle-line, the Caucasian front may be the most important of all between now and next May.

NEARLY a century ago, American Christians sent missionaries to the Armenians living under the Turkish flag. In their schools some of the brightest minds in the Turkish Empire were trained. This missionary work has so broadened and educational institutions of such excellence have been established that the graduates are well fitted to champion necessary reforms in Armenian social and religious bodies. The Armenian Church is the liveliest of the Christian churches in this part of the world. It is democratic in organization and outlook. It is supported by voluntary contributions and has on more than one occasion refused state aid from Russia. Its church services and its translation of the Bible have been in Old Armenian, which the common people do not understand. Its priests in the smaller communities have no salary, but depend on fees for christenings, weddings and burials, which they are not allowed to collect in advance. In addition, at Christmas and Easter they are given donations by their parishioners, who can expel them if they become arrogant through the amassing of wealth.

To this people the American missionaries went. If they were narrow in their theology, they were broad in their sympathies. And gradually they trained hundreds of young Armenians, both young men and girls. Constantinople, Aintab, Kharpout, Marsovan and Beirut have been among the centers of missionary education to which the bright young scholars of Armenia have turned. Years of oppression have sharpened the Armenian mind and repressed some of the nobler impulses of the Armenian people. But the Armenians of Turkey have had loving instruction, and in many cases have reacted nobly.

While the young people of Turkish Armenia were being taught in American Protestant and French Catholic schools, those dwelling in Russian Armenia were not allowed to have national schools. The hand of Russia under the old régime was heavy. But the hand of the Turk was swift to kill, and no complaint was made by those in Russia who compared oppression with massacre. A strong Russian state was the hope of the Russian Armenians, and though they chafed under oppression, the object lesson across the Turkish border had its sure result. This is why few Armenians aligned themselves with the young Georgians, Little Russians and Great Russians, who in the seventies endured imprisonment and exile because of their fight for freedom and equality in the land of the Czar.

IN Turkey, massacre followed massacre. Constantinople did by fits and starts what St. Petersburg could not do by pressure alone. The hatred of the Armenians was aroused against their Moslem masters. America and Turkey were sowing on fruitful ground. But they used different seed. It was not Christ against Mohammed alone, but patient love against unreasonable hate.

Few know the dangers that threatened Asia Minor and the Caucasus in the anxious months before Turkey entered the war. The Czars had ignored the treaties of 1783 and 1799 with proud Georgia, and the hardy mountaineers were chafing under many grievances. Russia's heavy paw was slowly crushing a race to whom freedom was more than food. Hundreds of young men from the Caucasus had studied in Germany and were sympathetic with German aims. And when Germany invited representatives from the Caucasus to Constantinople, an important step toward Pan-Germanism was made.

In the meeting was Parvus, a Socialist Russian Jew who was working in Constantinople in Germany's interests. He it was who had earlier opposed American railway enterprises in Asia Minor. His purpose was to foster successful separatist movements in Georgia and the Ukraine, among peoples who were too manly to tolerate oppression longer than necessary. With Parvus was Ahmed Aghaeff from Baku, leader of the Pan-Turanian movement. Germany had surprised the world with its lightning dash toward Paris, and the atrocities which have since stained her escutcheon had not then been multiplied. In mobilizing her forces, Russia was drafting young men from a race of fighters. Among all her soldiers, from peasant to Cossack, none were better material than the Georgian braves. But according to the treaties to which Georgia still clung with desperation, it was expressly stated that Russia could not use Georgian troops outside the Caucasus. Little wonder then that proud Georgians listened to the honeyed words of Pan-Germanists in the city of the Sultans.

THE Turks, acting for Germany, but as yet not in the war, proposed that the Georgians and the Tartars oppose the Russian arms. Both groups had ample cause to hate the autocracy under whose pressure they lived. They were promised that Georgia should have its ancient boundaries and full autonomy under Turkish suzerainty. The Tartars, too, were to have a large state in union with the Tartars of Persia.

The Armenian Social Revolutionary Party was holding a convention in Erzerum. They were approached and promised a national unit under Turkish protection. The old line of Sultans was gone. Enver, Talaat and the rest promised fair dealing. A volunteer corps was to be raised in Russian Armenia to throw off the Russian rule. This promise of nationalism was also made from the Turkish cabinet in Constantinople. Direct negotiations were carried on with Vathkes, Armenian member of the Turkish parliament.

Enver Pasha was confident that these plans would lead to quick and sure success for the Turkish arms. Russia would have to retreat behind the snow line of the Caucasus, forced from Asia, as Turkey was formerly almost forced from Europe. He even convoked parliament to announce the news of the occupation of the Caucasus. When the Turkish offensive began the Georgian Moslems of the Adjara district revolted. They were well armed, and directed by officers who had passed a least a part of their lives in Germany. With perfect ease, Enver's army secured the terminus of the Kars railway at the Russian frontier station of Sarakamish. Citizens of Tiflis, two hundred miles away, began to evacuate the Georgian capital.

IN Turkey, the Armenians responded to the draft with perfect loyalty, and organized hospital and relief work among their Turkish compatriots. But across the line in Russian Armenia were thousands of Armenians who owed no allegiance to the Turk. They had fled from Turkey and chosen another ruler. They could not bear to see such conditions as prevailed in Turkey enter Russian Armenia. With feverish haste, born of firm determination, they formed a volunteer corps of sturdy fighters, actuated by a worthy cause. The very people who had suffered Russian oppression without revolutionary tendencies, because they knew how much worse conditions were in Turkey, rushed to defend their boundary.

Throwing their columns behind the Turkish advance at Sarakamish, they cut the Turkish line of communications and set up machine guns in a narrow pass behind the 50,000 Turks, few of whom lived to fight another battle. At Ardahan, Armenian volunteers stubbornly resisted the Turkish advance for three days until Russian troops came and the Turkish offensive was broken.

Encouraged by this, the Georgians stiffened their demands on Germany, asking for entire independence, land on the Black Sea, and their ancient boundaries. The committee went from Constantinople to Berlin, where maps were prepared giving Georgia what she desired, but securing to Germany important financial and commercial concessions. The negotiations took so much time, however, that the Georgian committee decided that it was on the wrong side of the fence, not only from the standpoint of advantage but also of right. Although Russia had broken her treaties with them, they refused to be traitors. Through that decision Germany lost the aid of a fighting race who became her active enemies.

TURKEY'S boomerang had turned in its flight without bringing down its game. But Germany was not so easily eliminated. Of all the nations engaged in the war, she is least likely to overlook possible advantage. Georgia and Armenia had refused to aid in her fight for world conquest. The Tartars were outnumbered. But then came the order of Kerensky, which changed a huge army into a mob. The Russian army on the Turkish front became a nonentity.

Look at the map and mark how geography favored German aims. Along the Black Sea, Moslem Georgians, who had already revolted and joined the Turks against Russia. Joining them on the south the Turkish front, poorly manned, but with its morale unbroken. From the west and south, Islam and Germany held all the positions of advantage.

But the opposite front was even worse. From Kazan, more than half way down the Volga, to Persia, Afghanistan, and India itself, there was an unbroken line of Moslem races — potential foes. Between the two jaws of the nut-cracker were three nations, Georgia, Armenia and the small nation of Assyrians. And the only thing preventing the closing of the jaws was the demoralized Russian army. Spies swarmed throughout the whole district. Generals wearing the uniform of Russia were in the pay of Russia's foes. In no part of the territory did the Armenians or the Assyrians form a majority. But the Georgian nation stood in the line of every possible advance. Georgia had no alternative but to form a protective alliance with the Moslem foes which encircled her. It was agreed that if the Turks advanced, Georgia, Christian though she was, should cooperate with her Moslem enemies, and the Russian power in Asia would be broken.

This would leave General Maude's left flank exposed, and a retreat to Bagdad or even farther would be necessary. The Syrian campaign would then lose its value and the Near East would be in German hands. There was one time a few months ago when just that thing was almost sure. But for some reason the Turkish offensive did not develop. The Tartar movement was well organized, and the barbarous Kurds were whipped into shape. Before the revolution a single Russian general had issued 25,000 rifles to these lawless nomads, who have resisted racial development since the days when Xenophon encountered them on his great retreat.

WHILE a Moscow firm was manufacturing ammunition which would not fit any Russian cannon, but which an American journalist fitted into a captured German gun, an assistant in the office of the viceroy of the Caucasus signed an order to distribute these rifles among dangerous men whose loyalty Russia has never had.

But saner counsel began to prevail. True it was that the Russian troops were so badly demoralized that it was dangerous even to remove them from their position opposite the Turkish lines but at a safe distance from them. But in the endangered area were hundreds of thousands of Armenians, whose enmity toward Turkey was well understood. There were also the Georgians, proud descendants of a race of fighters. If there were a chance to save their country without treason, these men could be counted on. Steps were made to unite the two.

But even if this union were effected, there was still the danger of being surrounded, even from the north. Occupying the valley of the Don and the district north of the Caucasus were another race of warriors, descendants of the frontiersmen of two centuries ago. Their sympathy was enlisted, and today three determined foes are being more closely cemented together to oppose the worst the Turk and Tartar can do.

THE Armenians and Georgians, both Christian, are rapidly moving toward complete union and understanding, and there is possibility of a strong offensive against the Turks before next spring.

America can help with money and ammunition. The British are already at Samara, north of Bagdad, and there is a possibility that this winter will see the newly reorganized Georgian and Armenian regiments united with the British from Mesopotamia. "If Turkey's back can be broken, the beans are spilled." The Caucasian front may again win fame for breaking a deadlock which in spite of continued gains on the Western front promises no decisive change. No front in a world war is insignificant.

This much has already been accomplished. The rupture between the Armenians and the Georgians has been definitely closed. Never have they been better friends. The Tartar question is still unsettled, but in the presence of Georgio-Armenian unity its danger is greatly lessened. But German propaganda in the Caucasus is still potent.

The Armenians, fleeing from massacre in Turkey, entered Georgia as guests and have been very is a movement sufficiently rare to be worthy of mention. In the Armenian conference, which has just closed, the votes were unanimous, after every party in the coalition had secured such concessions as were deemed necessary to ensure durable good will.

Two distinct plans face the Armenian people. One is an Armenian state in the Russian Caucasus, including Erivan, Alexandropol and part of Elizabetopol. Local autonomy under the rule of Russia is sought. The other plan, which does not conflict with the former, is a New Armenia, about the size of France, starting with more than a million Armenian inhabitants and formed from what is now Turkish Armenia—the vilayets of Bitlis, Van, Diarbekr, Erzerum, Kharput and Sivas. This second plan is not a national question to be taken up with Russia, but an international question to be decided by the peace conference.

THIS New Armenia would be a refuge for hundreds of thousands of Armenians from other parts of the world. To rehabilitate this ancient land, after five hundred years of oppression, would be a point of racial pride. The Armenians is not estranged from such occupations as he could find there, and the land itself is rich in resources. The intellectual Armenians have long favored a democratic republic, since there is no nobility or privileged class among them. The majority vote decides all questions, the minority acquiesces with grace, and even in the church the parishes elect their own priests.

The territory is being redivided in such a manner as to give each local unit the government desired by the majority of its citizens. The split between the Armenians and the Georgians, begun by autocratic Russia and continued by desperate Germany, is definitely healed. Fifty thousand men who want to fight are being sent to the Caucasus front. These features in a complex movement may soon show an importance little thought of today. The Armenian Conference, just closed, has definitely pledged its support to Russia, and refuses to make any demands that may embarrass the provisional government, as they are willing to await the meeting of the Constituent Assembly.

GERMANY'S fight for a trade route crosses the path over which Armenian volunteers hope to cooperate with British arms from Mesopotamia. If the famous "Drang nach Osten" is definitely stopped, the Allies may gain an advantage such as gallant defense and spirited attack on the Western front cannot bring.

Behind the Russian lines and in Persia there are thousands of Armenians who have been helped by American relief. The good work is still going on. But if a Turkish offensive sweeps forward in this area, relief work can avail nothing. Armenians have once prevented a victorious Turkish advance and are now arming to prevent another. But if the angered Turk can sweep these tiny forces away, there is question as to what will befall the old men and young women among the Armenian refugees.

The need for money, organization and ammunition on the Caucasian front is immediate and pressing. The present state cannot long continue. Any day the Turkish advance, aided by men whose usefulness farther north is lessened, may sweep across the present lines and wipe out the Armenian and Assyrian races, two of the oldest in the world.

It is now or never — defeat or victory. Conditions in Russia are not improving. The Germans well know the value of a lightning blow that would secure all Asia Minor to the Caucasus for their allies in a desperate fight.

The Mesopotamian, Syrian and Balkan campaigns all aim at a single effect—the smashing of the German advance to the gates of India. But the critical point is now the Caucasian front, where fresh troops of Armenians and Georgians are eager to anticipate what may be a disastrous Turkish offensive. Turkey and America have planted big crops in the border land that was once Armenia. The harvest is nearly ripe. Armenia is again entering the lists to do battle for the right. She must advance to the tourney with the best equipment her friends can provide.

It is such men as these Christians of the Caucasus who make up the new armies of Armenia and Georgia successful there. Tiflis, the Georgian capital, is practically owned by Armenians. This has occasioned little hard feeling, for the Georgian is an excellent host and a poor business man. With the breakdown of the old Georgian aristocracy and contempt for manual labor, the Georgian will become more of a man of business. There is no reason why these peoples, who have intermarried to a considerable extent, should not continue a traditional friendship.

The Armenians ask for no territory which Georgia claims, and the Georgians offer full equality to the Armenians, with complete cultural autonomy, including religious freedom, public instruction in the Armenian language, and bilingual courts. Here are two separate races inhabiting a single territory deliberately planning to perpetuate friendship. It

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon
Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS INSTALMENTS

HOWARD CHASE, a young Congregational minister, single, receives a call from a church in Red Hill, a village of seven hundred people in Kansas. After consulting with his classmate and chum, Roy Lennox, he accepts the call and leaves with his sister Rose for his new field, where he is received by Mr. Burton, a deacon of his new church, and his daughter Agnes, and taken to the parsonage, and afterward introduced to the pastors of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches. The following Sunday he preaches his first sermon, and on Monday makes the acquaintance of Inez Clark, the movie-struck daughter of the village editor. He got 500 "dodgers" printed to advertise an outdoor service for the next Sunday evening. But on the afternoon of that Sunday the town is struck by a Kansas cyclone, which wrecks the outdoor auditorium and destroys the Methodist church. Howard at once offers the Methodist minister the use of the Congregational church.

HE went up to the pulpit to get his hymn book and Rose stopped singing and said, "How does it sound?"

"Sounds all right to me. You know, Miss Burton, my sister is safe in asking me that. She knows I couldn't give her but one answer."

"She sings truly, Mr. Chase. Most people can't sing this solo without spoiling this part—scourged and mocked and crucified."

Rose looked pleased. "Oh, that makes me think. I have another selection that I wanted you to try. I'll run over to the house and get it. Won't be gone but a minute." She ran out, and Howard, after a second of hesitation, went over to the organ and stood there looking earnestly at Miss Burton. She had gone on playing when Rose left, but when Howard came up she stopped as he said,

"Excuse me, Miss Burton, but I want to ask you about Miss Clark. My sister says you have been talking to her about the girl."

"Yes, Inez is one of my high school girls. She graduated two years ago. Since then she has been helping her father in his office. The girl has great possibilities for either good or bad."

"Rose says you told her the girl was crazy over the moving picture shows. Can't her father regulate that?"

"Mr. Clark does not seem to know or care what Inez does outside the office. He is trying to invent a new typesetting machine. He is wholly absorbed in it at night. Often, Inez has told me, he does not get home until one or two o'clock."

"What kind of shows do they have here?"

"All kinds. But mostly they are cheap sensational films, dealing with highly colored romantic episodes in the lives of girls who have abnormal experiences."

"Do you ever go to the shows?"

Miss Burton colored and then laughed. But when she answered her tone was suddenly all serious.

"I made a special study, psychological, I mean, of the whole film business when I was in the University. In fact, it was the theme of my essay in the sociological department. That meant that I had to go to a good many of the shows at Lawrence and study them. I found many good ones, but all too many of them were—were—well, wrong in their views of life, and I can easily see what will happen to Inez if she accepts the film view of life for the true thing."

HOWARD was getting more and more interested. He was on the point of asking more questions when Rose came in. As she came up the aisle her brother said:

"Rose, Miss Burton and I have been talking about Miss Clark. I wish you would ask Miss Burton more about the matter. I must go back to my study. We want to do what we can. I think it is more a case for you women than for—"

He abruptly went down the aisle and out of the church, swinging along in his quick but not noisy way, and, once back in his little study, sat staring at the Christ on his desk.

What was this girl to him? One of his flock. Why had she thus suddenly come into his problems to complicate and perhaps seriously embarrass them? A magazine cover type. A chorus girl type in this little Kansas town. A girl with romantic dreams, with abnormal desires—who had already boldly if not unmaidenly shown her feelings—he shuddered at a new peril hitherto unknown to his knightly soul, and for a moment he felt real fear. Then he smiled, and said "No!" as he looked up at the Christ. Here was only one of the flock, of his flock, in peril of something. He had only one duty; to rescue, to save. Was not that what he was there for? Yea, verily. There was no such thing as a woman in the case, only a soul in danger of eternal loss. And he—simply a means to save. He would find out more about it from his sister's talk with Miss Burton. And he would go himself and see the shows and protect the others of his flock from their influence if it was as bad as Miss Burton said. Perhaps he might be able to get them to show the better pictures.

WHEN Rose came back to the house, she gave Howard the result of her talk with Miss Burton. There was not much more than she had already revealed. Only she thought from some word Inez had dropped at a chorus rehearsal that she had an ambition to be a film actress.

"She's just the kind you see in the pictures. Of course, if she succeeded, as many of them do, it might not be bad for her. If she has talent that way, why not encourage it?"

"Miss Burton spoke of that. But she said Inez was not the kind of a girl that could stand the test of that kind of life."

There was quite a silence in the little study. Then Howard said:

"I'm going in to see what the shows are in this town."

"Do you think you ought to do that?"

"Yes. And I'm going to. Looks like a necessary thing to me. How can I guard my young people against a thing I don't know? If there is a danger there I want to see it and measure it for myself."

Rose did not answer. Then Howard smiled his rare smile as he said:

"I feel as jealous of my flock as if I were a real shepherd defending it from real wolves. You wouldn't have me run at the first howl, would you, sister?"

"No," said Rose with a sigh. "But sometimes I'm afraid for you. You need—you need—well, you know, Howard, there are so many delicate and embarrassing things in the ministry; you need a wife. There!"

"When I have you?"

"It is not the same."

To this he said nothing, and Rose, after viewing him gravely, went out to her work.

He discovered that the principal nights for the shows were Wednesday and Saturday. And when Wednesday night came he went down on the business street and stopped out in front of the little hall where the shows were given.

It was a white-painted front with a profusion of electric lights; he noted as he looked up and down the street that it was the one brilliant spot. The usual highly colored posters were on the boards out in front, and he stopped to look at them.

One represented a young man leaping a chasm about 5,000 feet deep, holding a girl in his arms, and pursued by a gang of ruffians on horseback. In the near distance an airship could be seen approaching.

The other poster depicted a drunken man trying to climb a church steeple. A policeman was after him, but making slow progress on account of a heavy bulldog clinging to his coat-tails. This was supposed to be the comic film of the evening.

He bought his nickel slip and went in.

THE hall was not large. It had once been a billiard hall, but it had opera chairs, and looked fairly clean, and had electric fans going.

It was about half filled, and people were coming in quite steadily. More than half the audience were boys and girls under fifteen. They were laughing, giggling and eating peanuts and candy. There was a pianola at the curtain end of the room, and five minutes before the films began a girl went down the aisle, took her place at the instrument, and began to unroll the overture to "William Tell."

Howard had taken a seat in the last row, almost under the booth that contained the film, and it had started its click and buzz when a girl seated four rows ahead of him turned and looked up at the little square hole in the booth.

It was light enough in the room to distinguish faces, and as the girl was about to turn around and face the curtain she lowered her gaze and Howard recognized Inez. He could not tell as she turned around whether she had seen him or not. But within the next ten minutes an event so unexpected took place that even the reason for his own presence there was forgotten.

CHAPTER IV

THE film had been going for two or three minutes. The little room was almost filled. The story started out with a scene in a stenographer's office in some big city, and the plot rapidly developed around a gold mine in Arizona, and the disowned son of a member of the firm who was working in his father's office in disguise and was being falsely accused of picking the lock of the safe.

Howard was following the story with a mixture of contempt and reluctant interest, when he saw Miss Burton going down the aisle. She took a seat at the left of Inez and behind her, but from her look in that direction Howard could not fail to note even in the dimly lighted room that Miss Burton had come for some definite purpose, and that Inez was the object of it.

THE story of the film was so melodramatic, so slushy and silly and awfully outrageous, that Howard snorted at it inwardly, and more than once felt like getting up and roaring out a loud voiced protest. It was not any lack of courage or audacity that kept him still when he felt the impulse to shout out his protest, but a sense of the utter uselessness of such a cry. The fault lay farther back. Whoever wrote such stuff (and evidently the name was Legion) was the real cause of the conditions and the false life philosophy, and he did not know who he was or how to reach him and wring his neck as he would like to do.

And with it all, as the lurid tale shot wriggling and howling across the screen, Howard could not shut out the thought of the effect of all this trash on the mind and heart of the girl sitting in front of him.

And what could he do in the matter to save the girl, if, as Miss Burton said, she was in danger of being lost through her fascination for the life portrayed on the screen? What could any one do? Why not let the girl go to Los Angeles or New York or somewhere and work out her destiny? Such girls were never satisfied unless they finally made the trial. She was a type. What could any one do with a chorus girl type?

AND then as he sat there his mouth grew set, his jaws rigid, his eyes filled with deep black; he clenched the sides of his chair with muscular grip as he said to himself, "She is one of my flock. If she is in danger of going astray I am a poor coward of a shepherd if I excuse myself and let the wolves get her. The power of Jesus to save is not limited. He never recognized any types and never excused any from salvation on account of birth or temperament. No! He owed it to his position as pastor to—"

And then with a sudden fling, as it were, all his acute bodily powers were in a moment on the alert; a sense of impelling accident and danger grew swift upon him.

Something wrong had happened up there in the little metal booth where the man was working the film.

There had been a commotion in the little metal booth, then a cry, then a puff of smoke, and a fall. People had turned in their seats and looked up at the little opening; confused voices and shouts arose, and Howard, obeying his keen and swift instinct, trained in athletic days, had darted up the short flight of steps leading from the front of the showplace to the operator's booth.

He pulled the door open, and a sheet of flame smote him in the face; the operator was lying on the floor crumpled up against his machine. Howard seized him by his feet, dragged him out on the little landing, lifted him up and carried him down the stairs. Down in the little entrance-way frightened people were crowding one another in a panic to get out. Even in the excitement, and behind the body he was carrying, Howard was aware of Inez near the door, just going out, Miss Burton next to her, in fact with an arm around her as if she had sought her out at the first sound of danger and had found a place near her.

Howard shouted to the little crowd to give him room to get his burden outdoors, at the same time calming the excitement by his own quiet tone. Every one came out of the building unharmed but in five minutes after the film had taken fire the interior of the place was blazing, and before the fire department could get to work the room was destroyed, together with the adjoining building.

HOWARD carried the man across the street and into the little drug store, which happened to be just opposite. As he laid him down on the floor he began to feel faint himself, and for the first time realized that his face was burned.

The crowd that always gathers in time of accident began to pour into the store. Many of the people who had followed Howard across the street were trying to get in and as Howard staggered up from over his unconscious burden the first faces he recognized in the doorway were those of Miss Burton and Inez.

They both cried out at the sight of him and crowded up to him together. "You are hurt!" they exclaimed together.

"No, I think not. Just a little burn. There ought to be a doctor for this man. Oh, they've sent for him? Now then, folks, there's nothing you can do here."

He sat down in one of the little wire-backed chairs by the soda water tables and again felt faint. But Inez spoke, and what she said stirred a feeling like anger in him so strong that he got up.

"What a wonderful thing to do, Mr. Chase!"

"What? What's that?"

He spoke so sharply that the girl was startled. But she continued to gaze at him with the eye of the hero-worshiper. Miss Burton, her face very pale and questioning, had a hand on Inez's arm as if to lead her out of the store.

"It was a great brave thing to do," said Inez.

A little murmur of applause came from the group that stood around. Just then the doctor came in. Howard waited long enough to find out that the film operator was not seriously hurt, and then he got up, still feeling faint, but what Inez had said and the murmur of admiration that followed provoked him into a burst of anger.

"You people get out and give the doctor a chance. Any man in Red Hill who wouldn't do—"

He looked at Miss Burton, smiled grimly at Inez and then said gently.

"Excuse me, folks. Nothing more to do here."

HE went out with his swift but noiseless manner, carrying with him the glance Miss Burton gave him, a glance that seemed to convey a perfect knowledge of what his feelings were.

"How did she understand that?" he found himself saying as he walked along to the parsonage after stopping on the street a moment to watch the fire.

But Inez was protesting to Miss Burton as the two went out of the store:

"I don't know what Mr. Chase is mad about. It was a brave thing to do. What a picture it would make! Any man in Red Hill do a thing like that! There isn't one I know has the muscle to carry a singed cat across the street, to say nothing of a heavy man like Jake Seymour. I don't know why he should get angry at what I said!"

"Perhaps he has a little modesty, as brave men are apt to have, and doesn't like to hear himself praised in public," Miss Burton said slowly, a slight blush on her cheek as she spoke.

"Then," said Inez boldly, "the next time I see Mr. Chase alone, I'll tell him what I think."

"I wouldn't if I were you. He won't like it."

"Any man likes to be told he is a hero."

"Not Mr. Chase."

"How do you know?"

"I'm pretty sure he wouldn't."

They had been talking rapidly as they stood in the street with the crowd there watching the fire. They lingered until the company had put it out and then started for Inez's home, Miss Burton going with the girl, thinking it a favorable opportunity to say to her a few things that had been on her mind since the talk with Chase that Monday morning. The people of Red Hill lived on their porches in the summer, so Inez did not ask Miss Burton to come into the house, but the two sat down in the porch chairs. The night was warm, but a soft breeze blew from the south and the starlight made objects visible in outline but not in detail. Going over it many times afterward Agnes Burton was thankful for the obscurity of that May night on Inez's porch when the girl so unexpectedly revealed her secret.

SHE had started to tell Inez why she had gone into the show, when Inez almost took the explanation out of her mouth.

"I know you think I ought not to go to the movies so often, Miss Burton, but I just can't help it. Something seems to just pull me right in. It's the only thing in Red Hill that interests me."

"Did you enjoy the story tonight?" Miss Burton back in the shadow of the porch asked the question to get Inez's point of view.

"I thought it was fine. Wasn't it grand to see that business man get his when he insulted the stenographer? I just wanted to get my hands on him. I hope they'll put the story on again when Seymour gets another place. I'm crazy to know how it comes out."

Miss Burton did not say anything, and after a moment Inez said:

"What did you think of it?"

"Do you really want to know?"

"Of course, or I wouldn't ask."

"Inez, the whole thing was absurd. The plot was unreal. The action was silly. The situations all made up. No one ever does such things in actual life. The average business man in the city never thinks of insulting his stenographer. She is just as safe in his office as if she were in her own home. And young men like the hero in the play don't act as he did."

"People do fall in love though, don't they, Miss Burton? You can't deny that."

"Yes, of course they do. But—"

"And they're not reasonable about it either. They don't do it according to any rule or the way other people would arrange it for them, do they?"

"I suppose not." The answer came slowly and after a pause.

"If you were in love yourself you wouldn't act natural, would you?"

Inez persisted. "You wouldn't care how you did act." The girl went on as if leading up to something that lay on her heart. And Agnes Burton, listening there in the shadow, no hint in her own mind of the facts about Inez, began to wonder at the new note in the girl's voice. She had known her ever since she was a child, and, as her high school teacher, had come to have a deep interest in her, but had never been fully her confidant.

BUT she took occasion now to bring the talk back to the film.

"It was the story as a whole that struck me as silly. It was not true to life as a whole, Inez, and the effect of it on your own heart and mind is not healthy. That is the reason I went over tonight, dear. I know the films are doing you harm. You are being unsettled by them. You are in danger of getting wrong ideas of life from them."

"And what ideas of life have I ever got out of this stupid little town, anyway?" Inez suddenly burst out. "What is there here for a girl to do or be except to work and go to church and meet all the stupid people one has met ever since you were born. What is there for me in this place? I'm sick of sticking type and watching Dad tinker over that pile of cogs and levers and wheels. I want excitement and something doing. I feel like being wicked for a change. A thing like what happened tonight just makes life seem worth having. I crave city life. I want adventure. I—"

The girl was going on in a torrent of unaccustomed confidence, and Miss Burton did not interrupt, hoping Inez would free her mind and give her full confidence. But she had stopped suddenly as if fearful of herself, or as if doubting how far she could safely go.

Miss Burton moved her chair nearer Inez and put a hand on her hand.

"I believe I understand how you feel, Inez. But what could you do if you went to the city? Your friends are all here. Your father is good to you. The town is small, and there isn't much excitement in it, to be sure; but Red Hill is in a beautiful part of God's world, and there is nothing to hinder you from going on with your reading and your education. You used to do some writing, as I remember. The magazines might take some of the things you used to imagine. And doesn't the church mean anything to you? Our chorus is interesting. And Mr. Chase—a curious note of quiet hesitation crept into Agnes Burton's voice. "Mr. Chase is going to make things interesting in the church—"

Inez was very still. The soft night breeze blew across the porch and stirred the leaves of the Madeira vine. A group of people went by talking about the fire. "Mr. Chase carried Jake Seymour clear across the street. I call that—" a girlish voice exclaimed in a high treble, and the words and the noises of the group passed away down the street leaving silence on the porch.

Uniform Mileage The Crowning Tire Triumph

Due to Uniform Tires—Built by Champions

A MIGHTY response has greeted the Miller announcement that Uniform Tires are now an achieved fact. That this world-gift is ready—that stabilized mileage is here after years of vain trials.

Previously, Miller Tires varied in mileage as others do.

Now 99 Millers in 100 outrun standard guarantees.

Run two Millers on opposite wheels and you shall see. Thousands of tests like this prove Miller mileage is stabilized.

Miller Tires

UNIFORM MILEAGE

GEARED-TO-THE-ROAD

Mechanical methods do not account for this triumph. For they are shared by all makers.

But tires contain much handwork. And Miller has excelled by conquering "human variables."

To make workmanship uniform, we had to make workmen uniform. We had to take picked men only. Then we had to make each man a master tire builder.

Tires 99% Excellent

Today these Miller experts are called champions.

Their personal efficiency averages 96 per cent. If a tire comes back their rating is penalized. But less than 1 per cent of the tires they build ever need adjustment. That means that Millers are 99 per cent excellent.

Geared-to-the-Road

In addition to stabilized mileage, Miller Tires give utmost safety. One reason is they are geared-to-the-road.

Their ratchet-like tread engages the ground as you go. This counters the tendency to skid.

Few Can Get Them

Such tires as these cannot be produced where quantity output rules. For picked men are rare. It takes years to make champions.

If you want to be sure of getting Millers this year you must reserve your supply at once.

Only enough for one motorist in 50 will be made this year.

Miller Cord Tires are the fine, big fellows with the extra large air-capacity. There is nothing more luxurious, yet they cost less per mile than the regulation type.

Jesus Lord of the Sabbath

International Sunday School Lesson for February 3

Mark 2: 13 to 3: 6

The New Spirit and the Old Letter

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THOUGH we may profitably center our brief class-room work on one point in this lesson—the attitude of Jesus toward the Sabbath—yet as thorough students of Mark's Gospel we must not fail to cover the whole of our assignment. For these incidents are cumulative evidence of the incompatibility of the old and the new, the rising of a malignant hostility toward Jesus that finally crucified him, the teaching by the Master of a new spirit in religion, a new attitude toward life. First we read of the calling of Levi to discipleship, then four criticisms of Jesus' Way that grew from that incident. There is a sharp antithesis, made clear by Mark's terse style, between the humaneness and freedom of the Christ and the pride and formalism of the scribes and Pharisees.

Jesus Consorting with Publicans and Sinners

Consider what a daring challenge Jesus issued to all the conventionalities when he called a publican to be an apostle of the good tidings! A member of the despised, hated, outcast group who were scorned, and not without good reason, both on patriotic and religious grounds. A man who had sold out to the Romans, a man who did not observe the niceties of the Law! The haughty Pharisees, drawing aside their robes as they passed the "receipt of custom," would never have discerned there a possible saint, a man filled with love for the traditions and prophecies of Israel, one who drank in with his very soul the precious truths of God. Yet such Matthew proved to be. Jesus did not call him because he was bad, but because he had mighty possibilities of good. He did not select him because he was a publican, but in spite of it. But when Jesus wanted this man he never hesitated for a second lest he should be misunderstood and slandered.

So it was when Matthew made his feast and invited his former associates, many of whom had already been attracted by the democracy and the power of Jesus. The great Teacher did not consort with publicans and sinners from any weakness for low company and loose talk. He sought their fellowship because they were men, his brothers, in need of inspiration and love, capable of being transformed by noble influences into the likeness of their heavenly Father. How wonderful was Christ's ability to attract all sorts of people without any moral compromises! Yet these folk, who felt the weight of the scorn heaped upon them by the orthodox, were quite naturally fond of a good man of high repute who treated them humanly and stooped to their friendship.

"He eats and drinks with them!" exclaimed the Pharisees. So unbrotherly, so unloving, they inquired no more deeply than that. They never learned of the effects of Christ's fellowship in transformed lives. We must be sure that his principles are ours if we are to be on friendly terms with sinners. He went in the spirit of a physician attending the sick, with the same compassion, the same hope of conquering evil conditions. He went, not to be overcome of evil but to overcome evil with good. He went, not to compromise his usefulness, but to let his light shine where it was darkest.

So Jesus brought the new spirit of redemption to take the place of the old ideal of separateness.

The Question About Fasting

How indirect and carping were these critics of Jesus! First they complained to his disciples about him for eating with sinners, and now they complain to him about his disciples for not observing the fast. Doubtless this was one of the innumerable fasts which Scribism had added to the books of Moses. I think the Master had detected a grudging and formal observance in this particular period of fasting. He himself had used the ancient discipline of fasting when due occasion made it seem advisable. But he had no use for the kind of fasting that we see today. He immediately told his questioners that his followers did not fast, because they had nothing to fast for. They were too happy to fast. They might as well expect a bridal party to be lugubrious and empty. In fact, he was the Bridegroom to them, the promised Messiah of their hopes. Why then should they fast? Time enough to fast when the Bridegroom should be snatched away.

Then Jesus told them quite plainly that he was very nearly through with trying to do anything with Pharisaic Judaism. There was a new spirit in his teaching that was incompatible with their whole conception of religion. Like a patch of unshrunk cloth, any teaching of his looked out of place to them on the fabric of their system, and moreover it was out of place; for it would tear away some cherished threadbare tradition. He could not be expected to pour the new wine of his truth into the cracked and dried old wineskins of their creeds. The latter would surely burst. Worst of all, both might be lost thereby!

New wineskins for new wines. New ways for a new teaching and a new spirit. What a tragedy that they preferred the skins to the wine, the forms to the spirit! We must avoid their mistake today! Let us hope we have learned to be adaptable, teachable, progressive, that we may do the things Christ would have us do even when our prejudices are offended. New things Christ would do through his Church in these days. Master, teach us, lead us, for we do truly care more for thy will than for even the dearest of our old ways, in church, in school, and in the nation that we love.

The Sabbath and Works of Necessity

Shortly after the feast at Levi's house, the same liberal spirit of the Master came into conflict with Jewish literalisms on the Sabbath question. We are all familiar with the story of the host of petty and unreasonable restrictions by which the scribes had made the Sabbath a burden instead of a delight. A tailor broke the Sabbath if he removed a needle that had accidentally remained in his cloak. Men disputed as to whether a handkerchief could be carried! But Jesus was too thoroughgoing to speak out on these miserable points, where he might seem to be merely taking sides. He spoke for the spirit of the day against the plainest teachings of the letter. "What!" he seems to exclaim, "you cavil because these hungry men reap a few ears of grain and winnow a handful of food. In all your reading did you never note what David himself did—burst into the sanctuary and took the altar bread for his hungry followers!" They were searching for precedents all the time—he gave them one not so much to their liking. Like all narrow-visioned people, they always ignored the texts that looked away from their teachings.

Then in his masterly way Jesus summed up his attitude in a striking phrase, unforgettable, appropriate in every problem: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." It is a means, not an end; a help, not a hindrance. To keep it in spirit and in truth is to build up one's own soul and to serve the higher interests of the community. To keep it in a slavish and Puritanical manner is to miss its blessings and do grave harm to others.

Jesus by no means abolished the Sabbath—he fulfilled it, cutting away the bonds that cramped its ministry. In fact, he made it humanity's day, instead of merely Israel's. The last tribes of the corners of the earth are today entering into its benign ministries. The new republic of China has recognized its desirability.

But Jesus did teach that Sabbath observances of every sort are subject to modification and must not be confused with moral issues like honesty and truthfulness. It is far better to break the Sabbath than to sin against the higher law of love.

The Sabbath and Works of Mercy

From that time forward Jesus was watched by crafty adversaries. It was probably but a Sabbath or two afterward that they found another grievance. In the synagogue was a man with a withered hand, and they hoped Jesus would heal him! How singular a mixture of moral judgment! They cared not for the man, but hoped Jesus would heal him, thus breaking the Sabbath as they interpreted it. What a strange love for the Law that they should eagerly look to see it broken! Nothing can be worse than a malice that prefers evil to good, a prejudice that stands between another man and hope. Jesus was angry, not because they rejected him, but because they dishonored true religion and were inhuman toward the needy. And he was grieved. It hurt him to think that such things could be. I believe he pitied those shriveled little souls far more than he did the withered hand.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Making the Superintendent's Work Easy

THERE are 200,000 Sunday school superintendents in America. They are anxious to do good work. They are limited as to time, and they frequently do not know the best plans to make Bible study, and particularly the Sunday school lesson, interesting and effective.

The teachers' meeting for lesson study, upon which reliance was placed in the past for stimulating a real interest in the lesson, is not generally held. The superintendent comes to the platform on Sunday to conduct the program, knowing that scholars, and sometimes teachers, have not become familiar with the lesson for the day and do not have clearly in mind the past or future lessons, which should be somehow related to the school plans, if any real Bible work is to be done.

A plan which the writer has tried in his school is to give the scholars special credit for reading at home, each day, the Daily Bible Home Reading.

A still better plan is just now available. The superintendent may increase home Bible study by promoting in his school the Christian Herald Bible Picture Study plan, which for these months has selected its pictures and the texts which apply from the Sunday School Lessons, the Golden Texts, and the Daily Bible Home Readings relating to the lessons.

This is an unusual and captivating method for interesting teachers, scholars and parents in searching through the Lessons, Golden Texts and Home Readings for the five months of December to April inclusive, to discover the texts which best apply to the thirty pictures selected from this material.

To make this very easy, the Christian Herald has made up a special booklet containing in full all of these Lessons, Golden Texts and Daily Home Readings.

The fact that a number of cash rewards are offered by the Christian Herald to those who give the best texts for the pictures will, of course, add great interest to the plan.

The superintendent can encourage the meeting of teachers and classes in Bible Picture Study Circles, using as a starter, if desired, eight Bible pictures and the set of Bible texts used in the "Picture Journey into Bible Land." The Christian Herald will send this set of eight pictures without expense upon application.

For fuller information about the Bible Study plan relating to the lessons write at once to the Christian Herald. (See announcement on page 112.)

THE RIGHT CAR AT THE RIGHT TIME

WE know of no car that fits more perfectly into the national policy of careful expenditure than this Oakland Sensible Six Sedan.

It insures its owner a year 'round return from his investment, affording him the utility of two types of car at the price of one.

Its moderate first-cost is but the beginning of an economy which lasts throughout the car's entire life, and which obtains in every detail of its operation.

Its simplicity, its strength, its reliability and its freedom from complication—all recommend it to the man who demands usefulness with thrift.

One of the most noticeable advantages of the two-door body on this Oakland Sensible Six Sedan is its accessibility and convenience.

It is very easy to enter and leave, and from its three-piece windshield to its broad rear window it is expertly made and equipped.

The individual front seats and the wide tonneau seat are upholstered in fine quality gray automobile cloth, in keeping with the car's interior.

The comfort and security of this interior are greatly enhanced by the competent performance of the Oakland Sensible Six engine.

At 2600 r.p.m. this overhead-valve engine delivers 44 full working horsepower, and under all conditions it is exceedingly sparing of fuel.

It is the able foundation of the car that has proved itself the foremost example on the market of high power, light weight and fixed economy.

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, Akron, Ohio

GOODYEAR

Volume That Means Value

No business rightly can hope for survival that does not recognize its responsibility to the public by which it lives. Such recognition will honorably be expressed not in declaration merely, but in the tangible value of the product for which the public pays.

MORE pneumatic tires are now produced in the enormous Good-year factories than are produced by any other rubber company in the world.

This gigantic volume has a far more important meaning for the tire buyer than simply as an indication of huge institutional size.

It allows Goodyear to effect savings in administrative, sales and production costs on a scale that lesser operations cannot approximate.

And these insure in Goodyear products a degree of quality and a measure of value impossible to achieve through any other means.

* * *

Twelve years ago Goodyear had but one and one-half per cent of the automobile tire business of the country — its yearly production was 27,000 tires.

Recently, more than this number were produced by the combined Goodyear factories in a single working day.

The stupendous growth indicated by this contrast made imperatively necessary such inventions as the Goodyear tire-making machine.

If Goodyear still were compelled to make tires in the old way, this year's output would cost $2,000,000 more, and the tires be not nearly so good.

In the past five years through advanced manufacturing practice, Goodyear's plant operation costs per unit have decreased twenty-five per cent.

In the same length of time, through the development of by-products, waste of materials per unit has been cut by one-half.

In the same period also, factory maintenance costs per unit have been lowered one-third.

And the proportionate cost of productive labor has been kept level as well, in spite of an increase of 75 per cent in the hourly rate paid.

Millions of dollars in extra value for the public are represented in these few production economies detailed here.

Millions of additional dollars for the public likewise have been saved in the departments of administration and sales.

All these savings have been made possible through Goodyear's steadily mounting volume.

All of them have scrupulously been turned back into the business to heighten the quality and value given the public in Goodyear Tires.

* * *

That Goodyear Tires do benefit immensely from these sources is conclusively shown by the amazing service delivered users by the tires themselves.

Moreover, further proof of greater value is clearly seen in the impressive figures showing reduction in adjustments in the past few years.

Last year, for instance, on a far more liberal adjustment policy than ever before, Goodyear adjusted proportionately less than a quarter as many tires as in 1913.

Thus the improvement made in the tires themselves results now in an annual saving of more than a half million dollars, which immediately can go back into better value.

In buying a tire or any other article, the public not only "pays the freight," as the saying goes, but every other expense involved in making and selling it.

If Goodyear volume had not allowed the savings shown, the amounts they represent would have to be paid by the public either through higher purchase price or lowered quality.

As it is, the Goodyear Tire the public buys carries no premium through either one of these.

On the contrary, it embodies a measure of usefulness and worth that is not rivaled in any similar product in the world.

Both Sides of the Fence

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"SHE looks like an awfully nice girl," I said, nodding toward the pretty blonde who leaned diligently over her desk.

"Yes, she does look like an awfully nice girl," acknowledged my friend, "and she would be an awfully nice girl, too, if—"

My friend paused.

"If—what?" I questioned.

My friend is an ultra-fairminded, ultra-kind young lady. She is not given to criticism. But—

"If she wasn't a hypocrite!" said my friend.

The blonde girl raised her eyes from her work and glanced in our direction. Seeing my friend, she raised a graceful little hand and blew a light kiss from the fingers of it.

"That," said my friend rather sorrowfully, "is what I mean. Anybody seeing that kiss would think that she liked me. But she doesn't. She told our office manager that I was incompetent—for our office manager told me about it. And she told one of the boys—a chap that I lunch with occasionally—that I was a flirt. He told me about it the next day. And once, when she made a rather serious mistake in filing, and I wasn't in the room, she said that the mistake was mine. Of course it came back to me; things like that always do come back."

The blonde girl paused in her work and nibbled at the end of her pen. One, seeing her, would have thought that she was a demure picture of harmlessness.

"I can scarcely believe it!" I exclaimed.

"It is hard to believe," said my friend to me, "especially when she throws kisses and smiles. I didn't believe it, either, at first."

"She looks," I remarked, like "a fluffy, pettable kitten."

"That," said my friend, "is the reason that she is so dangerous. She's twice as bad as the sort of a person who says what she has to say to your face."

THERE were five or six of us together at afternoon tea not long ago. Somehow the conversation drifted—as conversations will drift—to a woman who was not particularly popular with any of us. Almost every one of the party had something not too complimentary to say of her.

They had discussed her for perhaps a half-hour when I noticed that one of the men had carefully avoided any comments. I began to watch him and saw that he tactfully changed the subject whenever it came to him.

It was perhaps a week later that I found the opportunity to talk with him alone.

"You must like May Smith better than the rest of the crowd like her!" I said.

"I wonder," questioned the man, "why you ask?"

"Because," I answered him, "when they were all talking about her at tea the other day you didn't join the conversation. You sat at one side of the room and didn't pay any attention to what every one said."

The man smiled. "That wasn't because I especially like May Smith," he said; "it's because I've always made a rule never to say anything about folks that I don't want repeated back to them. I have no doubt that by this time May Smith knows just exactly what was said about her at that tea party. I have no doubt that she knew the next day. Things always get back!"

"That's why I don't talk much about folk. I never want to be in the position where I'll have no answer if any one says to me, 'Did you say thus-and-so?' I, if I do criticize, want to be in the position to always answer such a question with 'Yes, I did say it!' Then I can't go very far wrong."

"I wonder what gave you your point of view," I asked. "It's a bit unusual."

"It shouldn't be unusual," answered the man, "unless one wants to be a hypocrite!"

"Being a hypocrite is a habit," the Philosopher told me one day. "Just as smoking and drinking are habits. It's an easily acquired habit, too, and an insidious habit, and a hard habit to get rid of!"

"How is it acquired?" I asked.

"Very often," answered the Philosopher, "because being hypocritical is an easy way to become popular. The hypocrite can play a double game and get away with it. When every one in a room is saying something disagreeable about a person, it is far easier to join in the conversation than it is to keep still. One gets the idea that the others will be rather pleased to have him agree with them. Very often, an onlooker with a desire to please says a good many things that he doesn't mean, just to be agreeable!"

"That hardly seems probable," I answered thoughtfully. "Not when the onlooker in question is strong-minded."

"And then," continued the Philosopher, ignoring my interruption, "when your onlooker, who really has nothing special against the person he was—was knocking, goes to said person's home or meets him casually, he is particularly pleasant by way of making amends. And because he's trying, desperately, to be popular with both sides—because he's trying to sit on both sides of the fence and keep his balance—he becomes a full-fledged hypocrite before he realizes it."

"Then," I said, "nearly everybody is a hypocrite to a certain extent, I should almost think!"

"Not at all," said the Philosopher a bit angrily. He always gets a bit angry if he is made to explain a theory of his. "Because the people who are hypocrites through kind intentions and the wish not to hurt another's feelings are—are not hypocrites. There's a very fine distinction. Technically, I suppose, the person who actually dislikes a person and doesn't show it is a hypocrite. Technically, a person who, believing everything said against another person, keeps silent, is another hypocrite. But that sort of hypocrisy is almost to be encouraged. It's the sort of double-facedness that goes slyly through the dark, that insinuates, that whispers behind backs and smiles into faces, that is the hateful kind!"

OH, friends of mine, if you can be the kind of a person who keeps silent when other folk are saying disagreeable things, you are taking a worth-while position. Avoid saying or doing things to hurt people. But if you have something unpleasant that you feel you must say, say it in the open—to the person it is about. It isn't only for the sake of the person in question that you should take this attitude; it's for your own sake. Because it will make you squarer in your dealings and fairer in your judgments, and it will keep you out of the embarrassing and difficult situation of being asked, "Did you say something about me?" and having nothing to answer.

IT'S mighty hard to say the thing That you feel you ought to say; It's easier far to just agree

In a pleasant, smiling way! Sometimes it's right and they call it tact, And sometimes you're glad that you Can play the game in a double way— But sometimes it's scarcely—true.

Give me the girl who tells the truth

In the face of right and wrong;

Or give me the one who doesn't speak

To add to a tale too long!

Give me the girl who uses tact

In a tactful, truthful way—

For she is the one who plays the game

In the way she ought to play.

Playing the game—the game of Life—

Is a task we all must do;

And the girl who wins in the game of Life

Is the one who sees it through,

Sees it through in an honest way,

With a handclasp firm and true,

And a pleasant word, and a smile she means;

And I hope that kind is . . . you!

The Outlook For Woman Suffrage

By IDA HUSTED HARPER

UNDOUBTEDLY one of the strongest influences in securing the large affirmative vote for woman suffrage in New York was the strong support of the amendment by the press of the state. It was the greatest victory ever won for woman suffrage, as more women were enfranchised than ever before at one time, even in an entire country; and, what is the most gratifying feature of all, this was the free-will offering of the majority of the men, while in other countries the vote has been given to women by an act of parliament.

Perhaps, however, the most important result of the election is the immense impetus given to the effort for an amendment to the Federal Constitution, which is the ultimate goal of the vast majority of suffragists. Equal suffrage existed in eleven states before New York was added to the list. Each of these adjoined one or more where it already had been tried and its results were well known. This fact in itself is a convincing answer to the arguments against it.

Women should not be compelled to go on for years bearing the heavy burden of these state campaigns. Not in any other state have they as many experienced leaders as in New York, and probably not in any other can they raise proportionately the amount of money they have raised here. This campaign of 1917 cost about $700,000, all contributed within the state, and principally by women. There were not more than two hundred in the city and state who received salaries. The money all went for necessary and legitimate expenses, maintaining headquarters in many places, advertising, circularizing voters, and the creating of the most complete political organization of women ever known. For the past three or four years thousands of women have given their services gratuitously. This situation would have to be duplicated in all of the thickly settled states to carry an amendment. Favorable conditions existed here which are not likely to obtain in other campaigns. The war work of the women, their registration, etc., were a tremendous asset, and the men expressed their appreciation with their ballots. The Socialist party is stronger here than in any other state, and was a large factor. One at least of the dominant parties favored the amendment. The trade unions voted for it. The assistance of President Wilson was a powerful influence. No such combination of circumstances would be possible in any other state.

THERE should be careful consideration of what it means for the women to appeal to the individual voters. It means that they must beg and pray for the support of thousands of ignorant immigrants and of men of every creed, race, color and condition. It means that they must go on their knees to the liquor and vice interests and to the intemperate, immoral and degraded of every kind. In the North and in the South it seems as if every man should wish to spare women from this humiliation instead of forcing it upon them in order to obtain their enfranchisement. It seems as if the men in every state should wish to set their women free from the drudgery of these state campaigns in order that their services might be utilized along the many channels of social welfare where they are so much needed.

If the position is taken that three-fourths of the state legislatures shall not enforce their will on the other one-fourth, then it must be accepted that the Federal Constitution never shall be amended. Those who maintain the state's right to determine its own electorate declare in fact that the men of the state shall decide who shall vote and may hold the women forever in a disfranchised condition if they choose to do so. It does not mean the right of the people of the state, but simply the right of the men, and this is absolutely contrary to the principle of individual representation on which our government is supposed to be founded.

It is generally conceded that universal woman suffrage is inevitable. Why insist on the state-by-state method, which will make it impossible during the present generation, when a Federal Amendment would end the contest within a comparatively few years? After it has been submitted by two-thirds of each House of Congress it must then be accepted by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. Their members can be elected on this issue, and the men of the state will have an opportunity to direct how they shall vote. Should it be adopted, each state will still be entirely free to make its own requirements for voting, except that it shall not disqualify solely on account of sex.

A Federal Amendment offers the easiest, the speediest and the most dignified method for obtaining the suffrage. The women of all the states are joining in this movement for action by Congress. If all the newspapers and all the politicians in the United States should oppose it they would not be swerved from this position. Why then prolong and intensify the struggle, which has already continued for seventy years? Why should Congress wait until urged by the President to submit the question? Why should it not receive its mandate from the people of the country?

In behalf of the women everywhere who want the suffrage, we earnestly request that you will extend to this Federal Amendment your valuable support and help to create a public sentiment which will justify the members of Congress from your state in voting to submit it.

Prices Should Drop

THE Food Administration considers that most commodities should show reductions between now and the end of the year. The Administration has no control of the grower or the majority of retailers. The foundations have been laid for regulation of intermediate trades, and results are evident in wholesale prices. The regulations on distribution of wheat and manufacture of flour were put into force the middle of September. The retail price has not wholly responded to the reductions made by the millers.

The bean harvest this year is estimated at 7,000,000 bushels in excess of last year, or nearly double. There has been 100 per cent. increase in the Manchurian crop, and it is estimated at 2,000,000 tons. Practically the only outlet is to the United States, and these beans will flow into the American market from December on much below the prices now being demanded for American beans.

The corn harvest this year is 600,000,000 to 700,000,000 bushels over last year. The large supplies, together with barley, velvet beans, cottonseed, peanut and soya bean meal, promise cheaper cattle, hog and poultry feed, and beef, pork, poultry and dairy products at lower cost.

We have a harvest of 59 per cent. in excess of the potato crop of last year. The price, somewhat higher than last year, is due to a tendency of the producer to hold potatoes for higher prices, despite the increased crop, and to the inability of railroads to move the quantity available. The average price has closely followed the price the producer has received, plus the cost of distribution. The larger supply of ears and the large harvest warrant lower prices later in the fall.

To provide substitutes for lard and cooking fats, the Administration is arranging for the import of cocoanut, nut and soya bean oils. This should also affect the prices of soap.

Soon or Late it Comes!

Some foods that we eat, if hermetically sealed in a thin glass retort as pictured, would literally explode—no wonder we're half sick most of the time!

Some Foods Explode!

All foods are simply combinations of chemical elements. We know that we can't mix certain chemicals without having trouble. Yet we combine chemically opposed foods at every meal. These inharmonious food combinations literally explode in the stomach, liberating toxins which are absorbed by the blood and form the root for nearly all sickness, the first indications of which are stomach acidity, fermentation, gas and constipation and many other sympathetic ills leading to disastrous consequences.

Eat for Health and Vitality!

In his "24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating," Eugene Christian, the noted Food Scientist, explains your individual food needs. He specifies for you, too, the food combinations that send energy into your system instead of poison. There is an amazing difference when you follow the correct natural principle in eating. Even with the third or fourth day you

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble you can be relieved—and probably wholly overcome your affliction—right in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who cured himself of Spinal Curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. Eminent physicians are endorsing it. The Philo Burt Method relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness is taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebrae is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed, and the spine is straightened. There is bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. Each appliance is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction and let you use it 30 days. Write today for our new book. It gives full information and testimonials.

MAKE YOUR 1918 MONEY DO MORE

Until this wicked war is over it will be hard for most of us to get more money. The next best thing is make what we have do more.

A safe way to do this is to buy merchandise by name.

When you buy commodities advertised in the CHRISTIAN HERALD, you will find that your money does more than it does when you buy the imitations which are merely made to sell.

Only this best merchandise survives the trying test of advertising—buy it and make your dollars do more.

The Doctrine of Labor and Materials

THE present business of the United States is war—war to exterminate autocracy and unrighteousness and to establish peace.

The President has stated that the war can be won only if all the people of the country unite in a common purpose to defend our shores from aggression. No one group of people, or two groups, or three groups, can win the war. It can only be won by the united and continuous cooperation of every man, woman and child. The two Liberty Loan campaigns have demonstrated the willingness of our people to reach down into their pockets and lend their dollars to the government. A plan has now been perfected which will enable all our people to lend to the government.

The plan proposed has, however, an object even more important in the present crisis than the actual money which it will produce. It is based on fundamental principles so simple and so direct in their appeal to our people, that they cannot fail to meet with enthusiasm and universal response. These principles involve the saving of life. They involve pointing out to the citizens of the country that we cannot support a vast army in the field and a great navy at sea, and at the same time spend the same amount of money we used to before the war, for all manner of articles which may be perfectly proper to buy in times of peace, but which are not necessary to the carrying on of the great war.

WE have got to get behind the government, which is devoting its entire energies to waging a great warfare for freedom. This warfare requires putting men in the field and keeping them fed and clothed. It requires the production of ships, and shells, guns and rifles, motor trucks, horses, saddlery, airplanes, hospital supplies, food, and a great variety of goods the production of which calls for vast industrial plants from one end of the country to the other, manned by millions of men and women who serve their country as effectively as our soldiers and sailors.

If the American people continue to require all the pleasant and comfortable luxuries which they consumed before the war, they are making it necessary for these thousands of factories and shops, employing millions of men and women, to produce articles which do not help to bring peace a day nearer, when they might be devoting themselves to the production of the necessary things which will help to bring the war to a victorious conclusion.

Both things cannot go on together. We have pledged the honor of our country and our people to fight this war to our last dollar and to our last man, if necessary. America does not break her word. The necessities of the war must be produced and must be produced quickly. The key to the situation, therefore, rests in the hand of the average man, woman and child in every state in the Union, who can, by refraining from everything not absolutely necessary to health and efficiency, release strong arms to the production of materials of war.

THIS is the philosophy of labor and materials. This is the lesson which must be immediately brought home to the people of America. This is the sacred gospel which underlies the campaign of the National War Savings Committee and the principle which the members of the War Savings Societies pledge themselves to follow, and to induce others to follow, not for one day, or one week, but honorably, patriotically and persistently until we have fought this war and won it.

Our fighting forces are formed of companies of soldiers and sailors banded together to serve their country. War Savings Societies will be formed of companies of savers banded together to save their country. For the success of our army and navy, every company of soldiers in France, the crew of every ship, should have back of it at home a company of savers. As a united people, consecrated to the great task which lies before us, we cannot fail.

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 6421 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book, that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry. (Advertisement.)

Why Franklin Cars Are Selling And Why They Will Continue To Sell

YOU hear a great deal of talk about the automobile business.

Just write this down for a fact:

The service car—the car of practical utility—has nothing to fear from these exacting times. The nature of demand has changed but demand goes on.

Buyers want economy.

The car that meets conditions is not suffering for buyers.

The economical utility car will “carry on” as long as the country carries on—men must get about.

Unthinking people who refer to every passenger automobile as a pleasure car do not speak of the “pleasure elevator” or the “pleasure trolley.”

When the utility car stops, the country will stop. We cannot go back to old methods. Feed is high and there are not enough horses.

In Every Thrift and Efficiency Test Held the Franklin Established a Record

Perhaps because the automobile is a comparatively new invention, is the reason why no universal standard of mileage for either gasoline or tires has been adopted by all cars. Or perhaps it is figured that motorists are not interested in low operating and maintenance costs.

It remains a fact, however, that if all fine cars were as efficient as the Franklin, a gallon of gasoline would deliver more than the typical average of six to eleven miles. It would go twenty or more miles, as Franklin owners daily make a gallon go.

It is also certain that if all cars were as efficient as the Franklin, a set of tires would do considerably better than 6,000 or 7,000 miles. The national mileage of Franklin owners, over a five year period and compiled from owners' own reports, shows 10,203 miles to the set.

For every fine motor car to be as efficient as the Franklin, every fine motor car would have to be scientifically constructed—a scientific light weight car.

Trend Toward Franklin Cars Since Increased Costs of Gasoline and Tires

To get Franklin efficiency, means doing away with the gasoline-consuming Water Cooling System and adopting DIRECT AIR COOLING.

This means the elimination of the 177 complicated parts of plumbing that hold water—then as in the Franklin, there would be nothing to freeze in Winter; and in Summer there would be nothing to overheat. And the expense that follows these annoyances, of course, would be avoided.

To get Franklin tire mileage and Franklin long-life, every fine motor car would have to adopt Franklin flexible construction; its light unsprung weight; its full elliptic springs—the basic Franklin principles that minimize friction and drag, and do away with excessive and unnecessary hammering on the tires.

The used car problem too would be solved. All a motorist has to do to ascertain the relative long life of fine motor cars is to study used car advertising and the prices quoted. It tells the motorist, if he is alert, what to avoid when considering the purchase of a new car.

Construction of Motor Cars Shows Motorists Whether Economy Is Possible

Whenever a motorist wonders why he is unable to join in the conservation of the nation's gasoline and rubber—

Whenever he feels that his operating and maintenance costs are double those of his friend the Franklin owner—

He need only to examine the construction of his car.

Then know the facts about the Franklin Basic Principles of Scientific-Light-Weight Construction.

These principles and the 1,000 pounds difference in weight in favor of the Light Weight Franklin are very likely to make him a Franklin owner immediately.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A FRIEND testifies to a remarkable case of bodily healing in answer to prayer after the doctors had given up hope.

Mrs. D. C. praises God for recovery from illness and for the strength that has enabled her to live a life of seventy-seven years of service.

Mrs. F. B. bears testimony to the goodness of God in the bodily healing of her sister, her father and her brother, and most of all for a closer fellowship and a nearness to God that they all never had before.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Corning, Calif.: Cary Station, Ill.; Oakwood, Okla. (that many souls may be saved during revival); Mission, Texas (that a great work may be done in a new field this year, and that the saloons may be driven out of the town); Mallet Creek, Ohio; Nutterville, W. Va.; Truro, Iowa; Brookdale, Canada; Owosso, Mich. (that many may be saved during meetings); Atchison, Kan. (for the success of revival meetings); Dayton, Ohio (for a revival at High Street United Brethren Church); Winona Lake, Ind. (for meetings to be held at Carver County, Minn.); McAllister, Mont. (for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit on a community without a pastor); Fox Lake, Wis. (that town may be voted dry this coming spring and that the federation of the three denominations may be successful in bringing many souls to Christ); White Plains, N. Y. (that a saloon may be closed).

Mrs. M. J. S. asks prayer that a good minister may be sent to the Reformed Church at Holton, Kan.

Twelve friends ask prayer for special blessings for others.

A Subscriber asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; Mrs. S. R. R. that daughter's mind may be restored; Mrs. A. that a dear one's mind may be restored; B. L. C. and E. F., that their minds may be strengthened; Mrs. M. B., that son's mind may be restored; two parents, that daughter's minds may be restored; J. R. H., for the insane patients in Medfield Hospital; eight friends, for mental restoration for themselves, relatives or friends.

Mrs. M. V. asks prayer that grand-daughter's eyes may be strengthened.

A member asks prayer that mother's sight may be restored; Mrs. M. E. S., that brother may be healed of cancer in one eye; Mrs. M. C., that cataracts may be removed from eyes; seven friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives or friends.

I. M. P. asks prayer that daughter's hearing may be restored; thirteen friends ask prayer that their own hearing may be restored.

Forty-three friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. M. H. asks prayer that son may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. A. E. M., that husband may be cured of the liquor habit; two friends, that brothers may be cured of the liquor habit; Miss M. J. B., that a couple may be cured of the liquor habit; L. G. P., that a young man may be cured of the liquor habit.

Mrs. A. L. D. asks prayer that two young men may be cured of the tobacco habit.

F. H. B. asks prayer that daughter may pass her studies at school creditably this year, and be especially helped to master geometry; for guidance in the selection of a home; and that one who owes him money may be led to repay. Also he asks urgent prayer that his wife may be relieved of physical distress and returned to normal health.

One hundred and twenty-seven friends ask prayer for healing of friends or relatives; including Mrs. T. E., that father may be restored to health without an operation; another, Mrs. L. I. R., that a young physician may be restored to health; another, Mrs. M. S., that a seven-year-old girl may be cured of epilepsy; another, E. A. W., that a minister may be restored to health and strength; Mrs. M. H., that daughter may pass safely through an operation; E. R. R., that a friend may be cured of cancer; seventy friends, for healing of themselves, including Mrs. E. S. L., that health may be fully restored.

Twenty-one parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twelve wives, their husbands; forty-three, other relatives and friends.

Thirty-five friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Forty-seven friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including D. L., for world-wide peace; another, Mrs. E. E., that we may have rain in West Texas.

Correspondence Bible Study

Read What a Few of Our Students Say

This course has been a great spiritual uplift and blessing to me. I wish the blessing of God on The Moody Bible Institute.

A New York State Student

I have noticed a big improvement in my church work since I began the course, especially in the Sunday School and Christian Endeavor work.

A Michigan Student

What marvelous light I have received through these lessons! Long, long years I pondered over things in the precious Book that I now understand.

A Tennessee Student

I enjoy the work very much and am getting more out of it than any Bible study I have ever pursued, not excepting my work in college.

An Ohio Minister

It may give you pleasure to know that I have won two souls to Christ with the help of the last lesson, and the lessons that deal with Christian Science.

An Illinois Student

I have been brought up to read the Bible but have never grasped its full meaning as I have been able to do in this course in some measure. I count the privilege a wonderful one.

A Pittsburgh Student

In my nine years of active ministry, I have never received such help from anything as from these studies. What a blessing it would be if our younger ministers would realize this and take such studies for their personal growth spiritually, and as an inspiration in the work in the pulpit and elsewhere.

A Nebraska Minister

For all unable to attend a Bible Institute, correspondence Bible study is a practical, efficient and economical method of securing a deeper, clearer knowledge of the Bible. Over 5000 students in all parts of the world last year studied one or more of our courses. Thousands of Christian people will this year begin correspondence study for the first time. Will you be one of them?

Make Our Motto Your Motto

"Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." 2 Timothy 2:15.

The Moody Bible Institute has a fully equipped department, exclusively devoted to teaching by correspondence. You will be instructed by competent, practical Christian teachers. Our courses are thoroughly tested and popular. We have a course for everyone, young or old, beginner, student or instructor. Our aim is for careful business administration, most efficient teaching and courteous attention to all inquirers and students. We cannot urge too strongly all who wish a more thorough knowledge of God's Word to take up the work with us this season. THIS APPEAL IS MADE TO YOU

HELP US SPREAD A KNOWLEDGE OF GOD'S WORD!

"It is more blessed to give than to receive." It is also a greater joy to give than to receive, and when the gift is that of Bible truth, the reward is in the giving. The person who feels that he or she is spreading a knowledge of God feels as though a song is being sung by the spirit. We have all experienced this great happiness. There is no other joy like it; nothing makes us feel more like praising God than the knowledge that we have helped to spread His praises.

A CALL has come to us from many readers—a call to spread the Word of God by making our pictorial method of Bible study, called the National Bible Picture Study, available for ready offering to their friends.

We have answered this call from our family circle by evolving an unusual special offer for the complete Study Outfit, and by printing the details of this offer on three Coupons, which our readers will hand to their friends. We feel sure that this will fall in with the desires of many thousands of our own circle, who delight in spreading the Word of the Gospel.

OUR Pictorial Bible Study Plan, in addition to the enjoyment in the competitive element of the Picture Study, in addition to the fascination of the search, and regardless of the cash rewards offered to give added incentive, is solid Bible study of the most helpful and the most lasting sort. In telling a friend about it, in handing a friend one of the Coupons we ask you to cut out here and distribute, you will be doing real Christian work, real missionary work. Earnest Christians will more likely be attracted to the Study than careless ones, yet because of that we would not have you pass by those who are wandering from the road. Rather let your effort be, as is our effort in this Picture Study, to appeal to all your friends, letting the Coupons tell the story of our unusual special offer to them—made because they are your friends.

WE include in our offer 10 weeks of the Christian Herald, and we do this not only so that the new participant in the Picture Study will be sure of getting all 30 pictures, but also because the Christian Herald is our medium for doing Christian work, and indeed our Picture Study and all our other efforts are vitalized and made possible by the weekly record of human effort and divine love which we send each week to so many friends throughout the world, and into which we put so much of time, thought, prayer, and hope. Ten weeks of the Christian Herald, then, and the complete National Bible Picture Study Outfit, with all 30 pictures too, are what the man or woman or child will receive upon taking up the offer we make on these Coupons which we suggest you will be quite ready to hand in person, or to mail, to some people you know may be interested. Send a Coupon in your next letter to some friend or relative—and tell something about the Picture Study as you know it. In previous issues we have shown many pictures of the two books that make up the Outfit, and shown object lesson pictures and how to fit a verse to them. Perhaps in giving a friend a Coupon you will wish to show one of the previous announcements, because of the information about the Study it contains.

DO you know—think a moment—any Sunday School scholars, any Bible Class scholars? The offer made on the Coupon will particularly appeal to them, or to you for them. The Reference Book in the Bible Picture Study is composed of the International Sunday School Lessons, Golden Texts and Daily Home Bible Readings for December, 1917, to May, 1918, inclusive. This is a real help in itself, in addition to its use in the Picture Study. It will be invaluable to any person studying the Bible.

WE thank now all who try to help us in our work—whether their efforts are successful or not. You and we are working toward the same end—let us keep in touch, and help each other.

Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labor.

For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up. Eccles. 4: 9, 10.

AN UNUSUAL OFFER TO YOUR FRIENDS

Below are three coupons for free distribution to your friends. Each coupon tells about our unusual offer—the complete National Bible Picture Study Outfit, and ten weeks of the Christian Herald, for 35 cents. Cut out the coupons now, and mail or hand them to friends.

Christian Duty and Privilege (2) Winning Others to Christ

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. John 1:35-46. (Consecration Meeting)

Epworth League Goals and How to Reach Them

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 12:1-13.

"COME and see." This is the age-old invitation of the Christian to him who doubts the Saviour. A proposition in geometry must be proven; a truth in physics must be demonstrated by him who makes the affirmation; but the truth as it is in Jesus is self-revealing. The doubter has but to "come and see."

Having accepted Christ as our Saviour, we face again duty and privilege. Since we are his we share his great commission to "go." Since we seek in love to serve him, it is our privilege to carry the message of salvation to every dark corner of the world where we may penetrate, and then we can shout it still farther into the shadows. Only those who have performed the duty know the full height and depth of the privilege. Those who fear to step out lose the blessing, for the promise "I am with you always" follows the "go." Where shall we go? To those who know him not. Peter sought his brother, Philip his friend, Stephen went to a stranger in the desert, and Peter to an alien at Joppa. It is our privilege to speak the love and saving grace of Christ to every sin-touched soul; it is our duty to seek the lost.

How shall we go? Sincerely, as those who, loving Christ, love also their fellow men. Directly, for the King's business requires haste. Tactfully and with a watch upon our tongue, for "a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." Consistently, for if our life belies our words we shall be but sounding brass. Prayerfully, for our own strength availeth us little, unless it be supplemented by His power. Finally, in the power of the Gospel, study the Word and "it shall be given you what you shall say." There is no question which an honest inquirer may raise or a scoffer use as a foil to truth, which is not fully answered in the Scriptures.

Love, life and longing; Christlike love for souls, a Christian heart's desire for the salvation of men, and a life shot through with the power of God and made radiant by his infilling Spirit—these will enable us to win others to Christ.

A VERY similar topic was treated in this column last week as the Christian Endeavor topic for January 27. Leaders will do well to turn back to it. Whatever the goals may be, we may be sure that complete consecration of our bodies and all their powers to the service of our Lord and Saviour will bring us well forward toward accomplishment. Notice carefully the chosen chapter. It is a picture of the church at work, every one doing his best at that for which he is best fitted, no one pretending to another task or slighting his own. Jealousy of those chosen to lead by those best fitted to follow has ruined many a League chapter and made it impotent, where it should have been strong. Indolence, desire to do without the will to perform, has blasted many a promising plan. Ignorance, lack of information as to group plans or individual responsibilities, has defeated many a hopeful program. Ignorance can be cured, indolence can be stimulated to action, and jealousy, most stubborn of all, can be prayed or shamed into fellowship. In this war year there comes to every young people's society a clarion call to unselfish, unlimited and unstinted service. Let there be united endeavor toward the chosen goals; let none fail to minister because he had not been chosen to prophesy, but let each do his piece of work as well as he can, in the power of God.

Helps for this topic may be secured by addressing the Central Office of the Epworth League, 740 North Rush Street, Chicago, Ill.

THE International Evangelization Society, of which Rev. French E. Oliver is general director, has issued a "statement of belief," which includes the following articles of faith: Accepts the Bible as God's Word and revelation and our sole authority; believes in the deity of Jesus Christ, that he was God manifest in the flesh; that his death on the cross was a sacrifice for the salvation of sinners; belief in his resurrection from the dead; in salvation as of grace, not of works; in the personality and deity of the Holy Spirit; in the Great Commission, in the second visible and imminent coming; in a heaven of eternal bliss for the righteous, and in the punishment of the wicked.

A Free Knitting Book for Every Woman Reader of the Christian Herald

THE Red Cross wants the help of every American woman in knitting Socks, Sweaters, Mufflers, and Washcloths for the Soldiers and Sailors.

It has issued an illustrated booklet showing just what articles are wanted, and giving explicit directions for making them. It shows it all in pictures, and tells what kind of yarn and what size needles to use.

Almost every woman can spare a little time

Meat Costs 8 Times as Much As Luscious Quaker Oats

Meats, chicken, fish and eggs average eight times the cost of Quaker Oats per unit of nutrition. So every dollar's worth used in displacing meat saves an average of $7.

One reason lies in oats' unique food value. Quaker Oats yield 1810 calories of energy per pound.

Eggs Yield	720	Potatoes,	385
Round Steak,	875	Bread,	1205
(All in calories per pound)

Another reason is the low oat cost. While other foods are scarce and high, oats are plentiful and cheap.

Yet oats are Nature's master food. Among all grain foods oats stand first in flavor and nutrition. As a vim-food and a food for growth they have an age-old fame.

You can serve five dishes for the cost of a single egg. Or the cost of two ounces of meat.

Make Quaker Oats your entire breakfast, not a mere side dainty. It supplies every needed element.

Mix Quaker Oats in your flour foods. They add delightful flavor. And the wheat you save means more bread for our allies.

Quaker Oats

Flaked from Queen Grains Only

In Quaker Oats we use only the rich, plump, flavory grains. All little grains, starved and ins'pid, are discarded from this brand. We get but ten pounds of Quaker Oats from a bushel.

The result is a flavor which has won the world. Yet you get it for the asking. It costs no extra price.

12c and 30c per package in United States and Canada, except in Far West and South where high freights may prohibit $\frac{2}{3}$ cup uncooked Quaker Oats, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour, 1 cup scalded milk, 1 egg, 4 level teaspoons baking powder, 2 tablespoons melted butter, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt, 3 tablespoons sugar. Turn scalded milk on Quaker Oats, let stand five minutes; add sugar, salt and melted butter; sift in flour and baking powder; mix thoroughly and add egg well beaten. Bake in buttered gem pans.

Quaker Oats Muffins

Quaker Oats Pancakes

2 cups Quaker Oats (uncooked), $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon soda, dissolved in 2 tablespoons hot water. 1 teaspoon baking powder (mix in the flour), $2\frac{1}{2}$ cups sour milk or buttermilk, 2 eggs beaten lightly, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 or 2 tablespoons melted butter (according to the richness of the milk). Process: Soak Quaker Oats over night in milk. In the morning mix and sift flour, soda, sugar and salt—add this to Quaker Oats mixture—add melted butter; add eggs beaten lightly—beat thoroughly and cook as griddle cakes.

Quaker Oats Bread

$1\frac{1}{2}$ cups Quaker Oats (uncooked) 2 cups boiling water
1 cake yeast
2 teaspoonfuls salt $\frac{1}{4}$ cup lukewarm water
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar 5 cups flour

Mix together Quaker Oats, salt and sugar. Pour over two cups of boiling water; let stand until lukewarm. Then add yeast which has been dissolved in $\frac{1}{4}$ cup lukewarm water, then add 5 cups of flour.

Knead slightly, set in a warm place, let rise until light (about 2 hours). Knead thoroughly, form into two loaves and put in pans. Let rise again and bake about 50 minutes.

If dry yeast is used, a sponge should be made at night with the liquid, the yeast, and a part of the white flour.

This recipe makes two loaves.

Questions and Answers

EVEN in these days of almost universal privation and suffering, one occasionally encounters people who seem to have no idea of what compassion really means, and who cannot be stirred by any appeal to their sympathies. A lady wrote to the Food Administration in Washington, stating how hard she found it to be a real member of that organization. Her husband is a "good liver," likes his meat two or even three times a day, and isn't disposed to be either meatless or wheatless. He says "one family doesn't count anyhow," and that the food-saving campaign is "a scare." The Food Administration in one of its bulletins refers to the case, and says very justly that such a man belongs to the class of "slackers." Just such men lower the percentage of the home observance of wheatless and meatless days, so that they show as low as 12 or 13, instead of at least 25 per cent., saved on such days. Perhaps there is only one way to reach such men who put palate above patriotism. That is the more drastic way of depriving them of the chance to get any meat for Tuesday. In the case of sugar, they had to go without, thousands of them, because they couldn't buy it. So, in the case of white flour and meats. Nothing short of a famine will make them recognize the sanity of the Food Administration's plea for simple substitution, and the observance of certain days as the best way to obtain a sufficient surplus to send to our Allies. As for this particularly gluttonous husband and all others of the same class, they may have a chance to go real hungry before the war is over.

Quite different is the letter of another woman who writes: "When we signed that pledge card we meant it—I did, and I am no different from my neighbors. My husband laughed when I told him I had signed for us all and intended to go the whole program—seven wheatless, fourteen meatless, and twenty-one wasteless meals a week; but when I told him it was no joke and that we were going to try it he said, 'All right, Julia, it's up to me to take what you get, and if you can stand it I guess I can—and it'll be a lot better for the children anyhow.'"

Reader, Dickinson, N. D. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League to be made a subject of supplication.

J. M. M., Holden, Mo. I have read your valuable paper for fifteen years. I am interested in every feature of the Christian Herald. I read "A New World after the War," in the issue of December 5. Many old things will pass away and many other things will become new. Denominationalism is one of the old things that will surely pass away. No longer will there be strife among the various denominations in Christianity.

It is quite true, as J. M. M. writes, that the war will bring many changes. Whether denominationalism will wholly disappear, as he seems to believe, none can be certain; but we may look forward to closer and more harmonious cooperation among all the branches, and the recognition of a broader spirit of Christian service. We would counsel him and all who are sincerely interested in the Church's spiritual progress to read the views of leaders in all the denominations, which are now being published in the Christian Herald.

Inquirer, Palatka, Fla. The Turkish Empire, Arabia included, has or had until recently a territorial area of 1,700,000 square miles and some 24,000,000 subjects. By recent reverses it has lost to the Allies about 6,000,000 of its subjects and a considerable portion of its area.

Troubled Reader, Traverse City, Mich. You are not in serious trouble. The fact that your conscience reproaches you is a good sign. Unless there was some substantial reason, you should not have delayed when you did. Now, H. C. K., Charleston, S. C. Your organization is doing a fine Christian work in aiding the war sufferers in Syria and Armenia. We trust that you may be made instrumental in saving many lives.

It would be interesting, were it practicable, to know just what proportion of our population, as a whole, has responded or is now responding to the various calls that have been issued for united, regular daily prayer in behalf of this nation and its government in the present crisis. Some are doubtless observing the call to prayer for 9 A.M.; others, and probably a much larger number, are sending up their petitions at the noontime prayer hour. It is an inspiring thought that the great majority of God's people are keeping one or the other of these "watches" in daily memory, and we Suetonius and Eusebius. Besides, there is the well-known passage in Josephus's Antiquities (Book XVIII, Chap. III, P. 5), and there is also a reference to James the brother of the Saviour in Book XX, Chap. IX, P. 1 of the Antiquities.

B. Y. C., De Lamere, N. D. It is not practicable, owing to war conditions at the present time, to send clothing to the European sufferers.

S. G. H., Hatereek, Wash. I am a widow over sixty, and lived on a ranch alone last winter, one half-mile from anybody, and thirty miles from the railroad. That doesn't seem much, when I think of Mother Breshkovsky and her lonely life in exile. We had a Sunday school last summer, but neighborhood differences—and indifference—caused its death. I am hoping for its resurrection. Big oil wells are being drilled near us. I am dipping out of the wells of salvation dug centuries ago by the Omnipotent. Will send a bit of my experience and testimony.

Lonely, lonely would I be,
Lord, how lonely, without thee,
Time long since with me had ceased,
Had my fetters been increased,
Grim despair its work had done,
Had the victory not been won,
Darkness oft is changed to day
In the night time while I pray.

We congratulate our friend for her courage and optimistic spirit under trying conditions. There are many in like circumstances who will sympathize with her, and wish they had a heart as brave and a faith as strong. May Hatereek soon have a new Sunday school.

J. H. S., Pasadena, Calif. The "open door" in China means the throwing open of Chinese ports to American trade on an equality with other foreign nations now enjoying trading privileges in that country.

S. M., Enola, Pa. 1. A different reading or translation of 1 Cor. 3:17 is "if any is corrupt, God will give him to corruption." It means that he will repay in kind by righteous retaliation. 2. The passage in 1 Tim. 1:19, 20 uses a figure of speech in which faith is the vessel on which they had embarked, and a "good conscience" the anchor, by casting away which they were shipwrecked. The passage, however, does not imply that, having once had faith, they made shipwreck of it, but rather that they put away their good conscience and never attained to security in the faith, so that all their efforts to that end came to naught.

O. P. M., Harris, Iowa, and A. S. Livermore, Chicago, Ill. We cannot condemn too strongly the giving to our boys "Over there" or the use by them, of anything injurious to their health, and might be inclined to voice a strong protest against sending them cigarettes were we not convinced that what is being done in that respect is done from the best of motives and with no intention to do anything but good. Cigarette smoking is harmful to any one, but particularly so to the immature and young. Whether or not Christian associations should aid in this work of tobacco distribution must be left to the individual conscience.

N. J. L., Grand Rapids, Mich. Will you kindly harmonize "Love your enemies" and going to war?

Loving our enemies has its limitations. When one's enemy insists on aggression, when he steals our possessions, interferes with our inalienable rights, or does the hundred and one things that lead to war, we have a higher duty toward our own than we owe to the enemy, and hence resistance becomes necessary. The only justifiable war is war in defense or war in a righteous cause. Men like Washington, Havelock, Stonewall Jackson and Chinese Gordon were conscientious men and eminent Christians, yet they went to war without compunction when their duty required it. On the other hand, war is universally acknowledged as the logical outcome of evil conditions. It is the duty of the Christians to make war on war and to hasten to bring about such conditions as will insure lasting peace with all men.

Miss R. M., Corvallis, Ore. At the present time our one duty is to win the war, and win it speedily. Following the President's lead, we must bend every effort to do so and leave all minor considerations for a later time.

Cabin Home

By

MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A LITTLE lonely cabin beside a lonely way—
A little lonely cabin, deserted, quite, and old—
Yet memories that bless it shall never fade away,
Although its friendly hearthstone is gray with dust and cold!
For Youth and Faith have met there, and lingered for a space,
And Happiness has dwelt there, and Hope has crossed the sill;
And Love has made his home there, a smile upon his face.

Dear little lonely cabin, deserted now and still!

THE forest creeps behind it, a mystic place of trees:
A river flows before it, reflecting sun and shower—
And in the early springtime, the murmur of the breeze
Tells secrets to the bird-folk, and the arbutus flower.
A little lonely cabin beside a peaceful stream,
A little lonely cabin, from all the world apart . . .
I see it when, at twilight, I find the time to dream—
Dear little lonely cabin that holds my very heart!

take the whole matter to the Lord and ask forgiveness for his dear Son's sake; then put the trouble resolutely behind you, and perform the delayed duty at the very first opportunity, making no delays again. Talk with your pastor as soon as you can arrange a meeting with him, and be quite frank in telling him of your trouble. He will give you good counsel, and you will find peace. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League, which will pray for you at its next meeting.

H. F., Kooskia, Idaho. In Matt. 24 we are dealing with a double prophecy, the one treating of the general conditions before the world's end, the other of those preceding the fall of Jerusalem and it is in view of this double aspect that the word "generation" must be interpreted.

B. H. B., Springboro, Pa. Your kindly letter has been read with appreciation. We are not to judge others; judgment belongs to the great Searcher of hearts. We may hate the sin, yet have pity for the sinner.

trust they may continue to do so. We need individually, as communities, and as a nation, the strengthening and uplifting power of prayer to a prayer-hearing and answering God, to carry us through. We plead with all the readers of the Christian Herald to remember this daily duty during 1918. "Pray without ceasing" is the injunction, for "at evening and at morning and at noon will I pray aloud and he shall hear my voice."

C. S. L., Wisconsin. The passage in Mark 10:25 refers to the "needle's eye," which was the small gate or wicket at the side of the big gate at the entrance to the city wall. When the big gate closed for the day, all entrance had to be gained through the small gate, and to a loaded camel, or indeed to any body of considerable size, passage was impossible.

FLOOR-COVERINGS

Ask to see the New "Art-Carpets"

ALMOST every one is familiar with our famous sanitary Art-Rugs and Floor-Coverings; in fact, the name "Congoleum" is known all over the world.

Now we have another wonderful Congoleum product to offer you—Congoleum Art-Carpets—which should interest every housewife.

They are made in patterns of de luxe beauty in twelve different colors, something never before attempted in low-priced floor-coverings of any kind.

The result is unusually attractive designs in Oriental, Chinese matting, and conventional effects, suitable for any room in the house where a low-priced floor-covering is desired.

Another feature about these Art-Carpets is that they are three yards wide (108 inches), which makes possible a seamless floor-covering for many rooms.

Like all other Congoleum Floor-Coverings, the Art-Carpets may be laid without fastening of any kind. They never curl or "kick up." They are absolutely waterproof and free from burlap.

Congoleum Art-Carpets come in rolls the same as our other Floor-Coverings, and your dealer will supply you with whatever yardage you need.

Don't fail to see the new line. Price 90c. per square yard.

Congoleum (2 Yards Wide)

This is our original line which thousands of housekeepers have been using with great satisfaction. These are made in a splendid assortment of handsome designs offering patterns in all the latest color combinations. Made in two-yard width only. Price 75c. per square yard.

Free Color Folders upon Request

We will gladly send you free upon request special folders which illustrate these Floor-Coverings. Specify which folder you want: the one showing Congoleum Art-Carpets (3 yards wide), or the one showing the Congoleum Floor-Coverings (2 yards wide). Either of these circulars shows you how to have beautiful floors for little money. Don't fail to get a copy of one or both before you buy your floor-coverings. Write for them today.

Look for the Gold-Seal Guarantee

We show below the new Congoleum Gold Seal. The Gold-Seal Guarantee appears on every two yards of both the new Art-Carpets and Congoleum (2 yards wide), and upon the face of every Congoleum Art-Rug. If you do not see this Gold Seal have the dealer show you the name "Congoleum" stamped upon the back of the material.

Inferior materials are sometimes confused with Congoleum. If you will always look before you buy, as explained above, you will have the protection of our money-back guarantee.

Prices in the Far West and South average 15% higher than those quoted; in Canada prices average 25% higher. All prices subject to change without notice.

Questions and Answers

E. W. R., Scranton, Pa. I have an old friend who is, I think, the happiest Christian I ever knew. Her face is always cheerful and her talk is comforting to me. She lives a life of trust in God, and prays daily for greater love and faith. In her prayers she rarely asks for herself anything more than this; her petitions are almost wholly in behalf of others. She is always doing some little kindness to somebody. She keeps in touch, as far as her rather secluded life permits, with many little activities, and is especially fond of young people, and they seem to love her dearly. There is hardly a case of want or suffering of any kind with which she does not seem able to connect in a helpful way. When I ask her how she keeps so active and young, she simply smiles and says that she gets "strength for today," and that is all she needs. Your old friend is an excellent type of the sunshiny Christian, and we wish there were many more of them. We are fortunate in knowing several of the same kind, and they are living illustrations of the joy and peace that come to those who have long experience in the Christian life and who spend themselves for others. We know of one grand old man whose waking hours are spent in service of this kind, although he is now quite feeble. He keeps in close touch with a number of missionaries in the foreign field, has a copious correspondence with a number of "shut-ins," and is more active and zealous than many a man of half his age in personal work of various kinds in his own neighborhood. Truly, with such souls, the last years are the best.

Mrs. B. E. T., Warrensburg, Ill. We cordially agree with the sentiments expressed in your letter, and will give them consideration.

Rev. W. G. R., Savannah, Ga. It seems a reasonable proposition, at a time like the present, when abundant food crops are so necessary for the needs of the whole nation, that land could be used to better advantage than in raising tobacco.

H. O. J. J., Duluth, Minn. The first Testament in English was printed by William Tyndale, an Englishman, in 1525. The first complete printed English Bible was that of Miles Coverdale, which was printed in 1535, probably at Zurich in Switzerland. Parts of the Scripture had been translated into Anglo-Saxon as early as the eighth century, and the first complete rendering into English was made by Wyclif, in 1382.

P. T. W., Motley, Minn. The various passages in Ezekiel's vision, in which wheels and rings are mentioned, have been interpreted to indicate the gigantic and tremendous energy of the complicated revolution of God's providence, bringing about his purposes with unerring certainty. They also express the manifold changes and revolutions in the world. Some interpreters of Ezekiel's vision suggest that the wheels—each intersecting another at right angles so that the whole could move in one direction, illustrated God's purposes, which, however involved they may appear, cohere, being capable of motion in any direction without change of front. The simple modern illustration of the idea is the gyroscope, which is a wheel within a wheel.

Inquirer, Buffalo, N. Y. Farrar very concisely says ancient regeneration, pardon, justification and adoption: "The sinner is convinced of sin by the Holy Spirit; he exercises a penitent faith in Christ as his Saviour; God immediately justifies him; the Holy Spirit attests the fact of his forgiveness by shedding abroad the love of God in the heart, and all things become new." Conversion is "that change in the thoughts, desires, dispositions and life of the sinner which is the result of the Holy Spirit entering the heart by the exercise of saving faith in the atonement. Regeneration is the work of the Spirit in the transformation of the whole nature of the converted one.

It is the recovery of the moral image of God and the awakening of new spiritual life. It is wholly an act of God's grace, and differs from conversion in that it is a receptive work altogether. Adoption in the early Church was held to be the result of baptism. Now, it is held as following justification as a logical sequel, for if sin deprived us of our sonship, forgiveness re-

The Little Soldier

By W. Livingston Larned

IT'S "Captain, how do you fare today?"
When Bobbie is on parade;
And "How many miles will my soldier go?"
And "Mother is cook of the camp, you know,
And colonel, and nurse and aide."
I peep in his room, and I find him there,
Curled up, on the quilt, in his trundle bed;
With a quaint paper cap o'er the golden hair,
Like a martial crown, on his dear little head.

It's "Captain, how are your troops, my lad?"
When Bobbie is on parade;
And "Heroes are born of a saber bright,"
And "Goblins are planning a raid tonight;
Look ho! to the unafraid!"
The nursery floor is athrill with life,
An army of men that are made of lead;
And battles are fought with their stress and strife,
And poor little majors of tin lie dead!

It's "Captain, honor the flag, my lad!"
When Bobbie is on parade;
And "Daddy is playing at war that's real,"
With tears in his eyes that he can't conceal,
As the twilight shadows fade.
His two tiny arms hold me captive now;
His wee paper cap and the kind I wear
Just touch as I'm kissing the baby brow,
And snuggle him close in the darkness there.

It's "Captain, challenge the heart of us,"
When Bobbie is on parade;
"And see how you conquer us, fair and fine."
We lay down our arms (there's but love in mine!)
With your order "to hug" obeyed.
Ah, dear little soldier! . . . my path is bright,
From thoughts that I carry along of you.
We're both of us venturing . . . both of us right,
And both of us proud of the things we do!

stores it. Sanctification is the process of being purged, purified and set aside for service. It is usually a gradual process. Natural instincts and passions are chastened and restrained, and sin becomes hateful, and the soul becomes less and less subject to voluntary transgressions of known law. There are various views on entire sanctification, but these need not be discussed here.

H. E. M., Elliott, Ia. (1) The gift of tongue is understood to have been not only the power of speaking various languages which the speaker had not previously studied or acquired, but also the power to speak a spiritual language unknown to man, uttered in ecstasy, and understood only by those enlightened by the Holy Spirit. Paul, in I Cor. 12 : 10, is writing not to depreciate this gift, but to warn the Corinthians not to be led away by unprofitable or doubtful manifestations of it. Even in those early days of the Church, the leaders had difficulty in controlling the tendency to fanaticism among its adherents. The gift of tongues at Pentecost was given because of a great and urgent need. It is supposed by some authorities to have been speaking so that, under the direction of the Holy Spirit, it sounded to the ear of every auditor as though it were his own mother-tongue. There were many nationalities represented in the throng, but no confusion or misunderstandings. The gift of tongues on this particular occasion was the miraculous method employed to bring into the Gospel fold strangers from other lands. (2) The power which the apostles were to receive was not only the gift of tongues, but also the being filled with the Holy Ghost, under the guidance of which they healed the sick, cleansed the lepers, raised the dead and by their remarkable teachings drew to the Lord all who heard them.

S. R. P., Redlands, Calif. Democracy spells justice and equal opportunity; but since everything here below is imperfect, true democracy will only come after Christ rules and makes everything perfect. In the meantime, we should be glad of any democracy, no matter how imperfect, as against autocracy.

B. A. G., Bedford, Ind. The meaning of "casting out devils" has been the subject of dispute for many generations. The plain meaning of the narrative, however, seems to be that Satan had gained absolute possession and control of the afflicted persons, and that Christ evicted him by his superior power. It seems to us impossible on any other assumption to satisfactorily explain the words of exorcism Christ used, the words uttered by the afflicted persons, and the effects which followed.

C. H., Belleville, Ill. The ways of the Lord are past finding out (Rom. 11 : 33). The depth of God's wisdom is in his wise ordering of all the means for his own gracious ends; the depth of his knowledge in his all-inclusive foreknowledge of ends and means. These constitute an ocean, the depths of which we should ever explore, but can never fathom. We cannot understand his workings under various circumstances, nor why he seemingly makes a difference in treatment of peoples. All we can do is to trust in his wisdom to make all well in his good time.

G. O. H., Payette, Idaho. The purpose of publishing the Saviour's genealogy was to show that he had descended from David. If the genealogy of Mary had been given, it would have carried no weight with the Jews, as they would not admit the divine conception, and regarded Joseph as the head of the family. It was necessary, on their account, to show that Joseph had descended from David. It really, however, includes the others, as the descendants of David were so proud of their distinction, and of the Messianic promise involved, that no man of that family would take a wife of any other family. Mary, undoubtedly, therefore, was descended from David. The theory has been propounded and supported by Weiss and other scholars that the genealogy in Luke is that of Mary. Luke says (3 : 23) that Joseph was the son of Heli, whereas Matthew says (1 : 16) that he was the son of Jacob. It is suggested that Luke's statement should read, "who was the son-in-law of Heli," that is, married the daughter of Heli. Luke traces the descent through David's son Nathan, while Matthew traces it through Solomon. Even that explanation, however, has its incongruities, of which there is no clear explanation. The fact that Mary before her marriage went to Bethlehem to be taxed or registered (Luke 2 : 5), would indicate that she was of David's house. It is noteworthy, too, that Christ's claims to Messiahship were never challenged on that ground. If there had been any flaw in his pedigree, the Jews would have seized upon it without a doubt; because the prophecies clearly stated that Messiah would be descended from David. We must remember that Jesus had to be born so as to fulfil the prophecies, and according to these he had to be born of a virgin and of the house of David. If God choose this method, who can say nay?

F. B. H., West Haven, Conn. (1) Paul looked forward to a condition after death when the soul would exist apart from the body. He was willing to be absent from the body and present with the Lord (II Cor. 5 : 8). John saw (Rev. 6 : 10) the souls of the martyrs under the altar, clearly without their bodies. The parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 17 : 19-31) implies that the resurrection had not taken place when Dives made the petition to Abraham, inasmuch as the five brothers were still living. (2) It is not clear that Paul expected a resurrection of the body at all. He expected to receive a new body (I Cor. 15 : 37), not the body that was laid in the grave. (3 and 4) It is not for us to limit the mercy of God, but there is nothing in the Bible to encourage the hope of there being an opportunity of gaining salvation after death (see Eccles. 11 : 3; Rev. 22 : 11; Luke 16 : 26).

A Friend. You are very right in suggesting a campaign against the evil you mention. In some cities and states it has been begun, as for instance by the Committee of Seventeen in New York City. Any one can help in his own community. True help, however, must begin in the home. If we keep our girls away from bad companions and teach our boys more of old-fashioned reverence for the sex of their mothers, we shall go a long way toward eradicating the evil.

Helsingfors, capital of the new republic of Finland

The Latest Born Republic

By NEVIN O. WINTER

Author of "The Russian Empire of Today and Yesterday"

"WHAT do you know about Finland?" If the average reader were asked this question he would be obliged to say that he knew very little. The dispatches today tell us that Finland has declared her independence of Russia and has established a republican form of government. This new republic that is now knocking at the doors of the nations and seeking admission to the international council lies in the same latitude as Greenland and Alaska. It is not small in size, for Finland is about as large as the whole of France. The Finlanders themselves speak of their land as Suomen-maa, or Suomi. It is a region of lakes and granite rocks, much of it desolate and water-logged, where winter reigns supreme for from seven to nine months in the year. At least one-ninth of the surface is covered with lakes and the greater part of the rest is forest. Less than one acre in thirty is arable, but a somewhat larger amount is suited for grazing.

We think of Greenland as a frozen and desolate land, fit only for the abode of the hardy Eskimos. And yet in Finland, in a severe northern climate, has grown up a hardy and virile race. Perhaps it was because only the sturdiest could survive under such conditions, for isolation bred self-reliance and industry was necessary to existence. At any rate the fact remains that the Finns have developed a civilization that is unique and of interest. It is not surprising, to one familiar with the Finns and their history, to know that a republic has been proclaimed. No people are more truly democratic. Under the autocratic rule of the Czars, Finland maintained her democratic institutions, and it was the only part of Russia where the traveler was free to move about without having a demand made almost daily for his passport. The Russian calendar, which is thirteen days behind our own, was ignored, and in every way the public and social customs differed from those of the Russians.

THE Finns have always objected to being classed as Russians. Of Mongolian descent, they were among the earliest of the Oriental races to cross the Urals and descend upon the fertile plains of Russia. They were gradually driven to the inhospitable north by successive waves of immigration. They are first cousins to the Magyars of Hungary and distant cousins of the Turk. Like the Celts of Ireland, the Finns were never able to establish an independent state capable of resisting the external pressure of Teuton, Slav and Turk. In the twelfth century they were brought under the sway of the roving Vikings, who organized a crusade to convert the heathen Finns.

Since then the country has been buffeted about between Sweden and Russia. Peter the Great conquered a part of it, but the entire country was not annexed until one hundred and ten years ago. Then it was really a union and not an unconditional surrender. The Czar took the title of Grand Duke of Finland, and as such he continued to rule until the NEWS of the recognition of Finland's independence is of special interest to Christian Herald readers, who for many years have had a warm corner in their hearts for the sturdy, simple, earnest Finnish folk. Sixteen years ago, during the prevalence of a serious famine in that country, the Christian Herald sent an embassy of helpfulness to the Finns. The late Dr. Klopsch personally visited their land and superintended the distribution of a large relief fund, representing the combined gifts of thousands of our readers. There has been news of another famine in Finland this year, but simultaneously with the recognition of Finnish independence comes the announcement through the Frankfurter Zeitung that Germany has restored 52,000,000 marks ($10,400,000), representing money seized at the beginning of the war, so that Finland will at least have sufficient resources to meet any immediate emergency. Mr. Winter, who has traveled widely in Europe, knows the Finns and writes about them with sympathetic interest. Switzerland, also, has recognized the new Republic.

abdication of Nicholas II. The fundamental laws of the country were officially recognized and confirmed by each succeeding autocrat, although in recent years there had been much encroachment on the rights of the independent Finns in the attempt at Russification. For this reason there has been great unrest for more than two decades.

Until 1898 Finland had not been required to furnish soldiers for the imperial Russian army. In that year the Czar informed the Diet (Congress) that the military service must be made to conform to that of the rest of the Empire. Finnish susceptibilities were aroused, as this seemed but the opening wedge for the destruction of all their liberties. The people entered upon a campaign of passive resistance. Every man, woman and child dressed in mourning on the Sunday succeeding the manifesto. Bells were tolled in the churches, and places of amusement were closed. Many thousands emigrated to the United States.

DURING the long winters daylight lasts only three or four hours. On the shortest days it is even less. Then it is indeed, as most people think, a land of snow and ice. For three months it is so hot that the wealthy residents seek summer resorts for comfort. During that time it is practically one long day. Not a star is to be seen, and the appearance of the first star is a sign that summer is past and the time of autumn frosts has arrived.

During my visit, the evening twilight had scarcely disappeared before the morning twilight chased the gloom of night away. One could read out of doors until after eleven o'clock. These long days, with scarcely any night, force vegetation to grow at a hothouse pace. Land and water have no time to cool. Summer comes in this strange land with a sudden burst of flowers, sunlight and birds.

Finland is a land of pine- and fir-clad hills, for only a comparatively small portion seems to be cleared. The most of the country is fairly level, so that it has not the grandeur of the Scandinavian kingdom. In the cleared portions stand neat little wooden cottages, which are usually kept freshly painted, red being the favorite color. Surface drain ditches are made in the cultivated fields every few rods, and all seems most carefully tilled.

Helsingfors, the capital of Finland, is one of the interesting towns of Europe. Water seems to surround it on every side. It dates back to 1550, when it was founded by the Swedish king Gustavus Vasa, and the liberties of a town were immediately conferred upon the little hamlet as a special favor. From the water side it is protected by the great fortress of Sveaborg, which is called the "Gibraltar of the Baltic," and of which one occasionally reads in the news dispatches. The highest point in Helsingfors is crowned by a great and imposing Lutheran church, and the majority of the Finns are adherents of this faith.

THROUGH the center of Helsingfors runs a great boulevard, known as the Esplanade-Gatan, and this is the center of life in summer. The schools close for these months and everybody enjoys one long holiday so far as possible. One day seems almost to melt into another. The young women one sees in Helsingfors are of the blue-eyed, flaxen-haired type, for the Swedish type seems to prevail here. Young girls, almost to the end of their teens, wear their hair in two flaxen braids that hang down the back. They have the same social freedom as their sisters on this side of the Atlantic.

The market of Helsingfors is an excellent place to study the Finns and their characteristics. From all over the surrounding country the peasants drive into the towns with their produce, and sell it direct to the townfolk. A small farmer may have killed a sheep or pig, and may be observed driving a keen bargain for the best cuts. Another has a few tiny kegs of butter covered with a layer of grass to keep it cool. Under old cotton umbrellas sit the market women with highly colored waists and black or white handkerchiefs tied over their heads. In a small basin are the boats of the fishermen just in from their catch. The housewives or maids pass from one stall or boat to another, inspecting their wares. A little after noon the fishermen and market merchants, who have come by sea, set sail, the cotton umbrellas come down, the wagons roll away, and the entire market disappears as by magic.

Speeding Up Alaska's Railroad

By CHARLES LORAN MASON

The anchorage at Anchorage, Alaska, where Uncle Sam's railroad touches the sea

IN these days of high cost of material and labor, it is no small task to build five hundred miles of railroad, particularly in Alaska. This is what our government has undertaken to do in the Far North, where the sun barely sets in the summer and just as sparingly rises in the winter. The line when completed will extend from Seward, on beautiful Resurrection Bay, to Fairbanks, in the fertile Tanana Valley of the interior. There will also be branch lines to the Chickaloon and other coal fields, and spurs tapping the rich copper and gold regions.

Already the steel is creeping inland at a satisfactory pace and the shrieks of locomotives are echoing through the forests. Under supervision of a commission appointed by the President, the task has been attacked at three principal places, in order that the maximum number of men may be employed and for the convenience of shipping supplies. These places are Seward, on the coast, Anchorage, at the head of Cook Inlet, and Nenana, near Fairbanks in the interior. By far the largest force has been working out of Anchorage, the new town established by the government as a base from which to work both southward toward Seward and northward toward Fairbanks. On this division alone as high as 4,400 men have been employed at one time. At the close of the 1917 season there were in operation slightly more than half the 511 miles of the total to be built, or, to be exact, 262 miles. It must be remembered that a northern wilderness has been attacked 1,500 miles from the base of supplies and the labor market.

RAILROAD construction projects naturally bring together a rough class of men, and in the aggregation on this far northern project are many foreigners. Far from home associations and civilized surroundings, in the rugged North men seem to find it easy to relax their morals and give themselves up to money-getting and sensual pleasure. A log building houses the railroad Y. M. C. A. at Anchorage. This organization was on the ground early, bending its energies in behalf of the men who flocked from the States and various parts of Alaska at the announcement of the government's intention to construct the road. It receives and distributes to the gangs along the line papers, magazines, etc. At the headquarters educational work is carried on to an extent that is amazing when the limited facilities are taken into account. Bowling alleys, game tables, and the usual recreational features are available for the shop, office and construction forces. The government constructed the building and pays the secretary in charge. At Anchorage the United States Army has a detachment of troops stationed for the protection of the government property in this vicinity, and the Y. M.

C. A. has extended to these soldier boys the privileges of the institution.

The churches, too, were early on the scene. The People's (Congregational) Church erected a building, and each Sunday evening following the sermon there is an open discussion on subjects vital to human living. This is a very popular meeting. The Catholic, Episcopal, and Presbyterian churches also have substantial buildings. The Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Christian churches have their missionaries out along the line holding religious services for the men and in the small communities which have grown up along the line, and ministering in every way possible. There are two Christian Endeavor Societies in Anchorage, one in the People's Church and one in the Presbyterian Church.

Anchorage has grown to a town of 5,500 people, and the churches and other religious organizations mean to keep pace with the progress in all lines.

The Latest Born Republic

Women in Finland do more than attend the stalls in the market or the washing along the streams. I have seen them spading flower-beds in the public parks, and cleaning the streets. With huge broom in hand they march along and sweep the streets as thoroughly as the men might do. It is nothing unusual to see women carpenters or plasterers at work on new buildings. Even bricklaying and paperhanging have their female professionals. In fact, it is a country where women's rights are fully respected. The position of women in Finland savors of America. The property rights of the two sexes are exactly the same. For a number of years they have had equal suffrage, and more than a score of women have been members of the national legislative body, known as the Diet.

THE Diet will now be of much greater importance than heretofore, if independence is maintained. It is one of the most democratic and representative chambers in the world. This is undoubtedly due to the enlightened policy of education that has long characterized Finland. It consists of four estates or orders. These are the Nobility, Clergy, Burghers and Peasantry. In the House of Nobles only a few members now bear titles, but the most of them are untitled members of this aristocratic estate. The Burghers include the representatives of the towns, although formerly it was confined to members of the trade guilds. From 1809 to 1863 the Diet was not once convoked, but more recently it has been called together about once every three years. A majority vote in three out of the four estates is sufficient to pass any legislation, except a change in the fundamental law.

EDUKATION in Finland is free but not compulsory. The absence of it is regarded as such a discredit, however, and emulation is so keen, that it is practically universal. The higher education is encouraged by making the tuition very low. The profession of school-teaching is looked up to, and gives the teacher a high standing in the community. The universality of education has made newspapers common, and there is hardly a town of any importance without its own newspaper.

In many ways the Finns are a very queer people. It is during the terribly cold months that the Finns revel in the mighty ovens that fill one corner of every kitchen and often loom up large and vastly impressive in the other rooms of a Finn home as well. The tops of these monster stoves are perfectly flat, and steps lead up on one side. When the weather becomes bitterly cold and bleak, the entire Finnish family will take quilts and pillows and, mounting to the top of the big heater, spread down their bedding and sleep very comfortably and contentedly on the hard hot bricks until morning.

Finland of today is a prosperous and rapidly developing country, inhabited by an enterprising, progressive and hospitable people. The population is, roughly speaking, three millions. Dairy farming has become one of the most important industries. It is more profitable than the raising of grains, because of the uncertainty of the seasons. There is absolutely no reason why the Republic of Finland should not be a success, if left undisturbed by more powerful and ambitious neighbors. The people are intelligent, democratic and frugal, and have had enough experience in self-government to be of great help in solving the various perplexing problems that are sure to arise. There is no logical reason why they should be subjects of Slavic Russia. Hence the Republic of Finland should be welcomed among the nations of the world.

We are indebted to Finnish literature for the inspiration of one of our great poems by one of our sweetest singers. Without a written literature, there was handed down from father to son for many generations in Finland a great national epic. In the long winter evenings the singers sat beside the flaming pine logs, and there sang snatches from this epic. Finally there appeared one Elias Lönnrot, a simple country physician, who traveled over the country and collected this unwritten epic from the memories of hundreds of these singers. He called the collection the Kalevala, and it was first published in 1835. Longfellow copied the style in his "Hiawatha."

One of those songs of the Kalevala, which is still repeated at the weddings of the country folk, describes the duty of the husband:

Teach one year in words of kindness,
Teach with eyes of love a second.
In the third year teach with firmness
If she should not heed thy teaching.

Then instruct her with the willow.
Use the birch-rod from the mountain.
In the closet of thy dwelling,
In the attic of thy mansion.

Strike her not upon the common,
Do not conquer her in public.
Lest the villagers should see thee,
Lest the neighbors hear her weeping.

Does this sentiment please either the Twentieth Century man or woman?

Twenty Sheep to Clothe a Soldier

The World's Short Wool Crop and What Uncle Sam Is Doing to Increase Production

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

HOW much wool shall we need for the Army?"

I have put this question to the experts of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry. They reply that it will take 160 pounds a year for every soldier we send to the trenches, and that it will keep twenty sheep working to supply that amount. This is supposing that each sheep gives a fleece of eight pounds. So you see that for every million men we send over the ocean we must have 20,000,000 full-grown sheep here at home, or in some other parts of the world, and this in addition to the vast amount of wool we need to clothe our own people.

One hundred and sixty pounds! It seems like a lot of wool for one man, but you must remember that the fleece, as it comes from the sheep, is about two-thirds grease and dirt, and that the fibers selected to make woolen cloth are only a part of the whole.

In order to know just how the wool is used I have asked some of the private soldiers at Camp Meade as to the outfits they are carrying with them to France. They tell me that the government has issued to each man one overcoat, two service uniforms, two olive-drab shirts, three suits of heavy underwear, six pairs of light-weight and four pairs of heavy-weight socks, two pairs of thick gloves and four warm blankets. All of these must be of the purest of wool, and the same is true of the helmets and sweaters which our women are knitting all over the country. I venture there are now something like a million women and girls plying their needles, and that the yarn they consume will add one or two sheep to the flock of each soldier.

THERE is already a shortage of wool, and, as the men in the trenches must be kept warm, the rest of us will be forced to wear shoddy or mixtures of cotton and wool in order that the supplies for the Army may not be impaired. Every woolen mill in the United States capable of making anything for the soldiers is now busy upon war orders, and the question is where we shall get the wool to supply them. We have something like 500 factories in New England, and there are hundreds of others scattered here and there over the country. They range in size from small concerns, with two or three dozen hands, up to that of the American Woolen Company, at Lawrence, Mass., whose machines occupy 600 million square feet of floor space and eat up the fleeces of 25,000 sheep every day.

AS to our own product of wool, this has been steadily declining, while the consumption has just as steadily increased. We produced 321,060,000 pounds of wool in 1910, and our production last year was 26,000,000 pounds less. At present, as it comes from the fleece, the total amount of wool we produce is so little that if equally divided it would give only three pounds to every man, woman and child in the United States. It is so little that if it were all made into clothing it would hardly suffice to supply a suit for one person in three.

Moreover, a decline is going on in the production of wool all over the world. The crop of 1914, the year the war began, was less than 3,000,000,000 pounds, and at that time the whole world had only a little more than 600,000,000 sheep. Since then Australia, which had more sheep than any other country, has had a great drought, which has reduced her flock more than 12,000,000 head.

The sheep of Europe have been slaughtered by thousands as food for the soldiers. At the time she marched into Belgium Germany had less than 5,000,000 sheep and Austria not half that number. In both of these countries the flocks have been so greatly reduced as to create a wool famine. Everyone else is skimping and saving and the German government has cut down the wool consumption by making the people turn in all their old clothes before they get new ones and allowing them to buy woolen goods only with eards.

THERE has been a notable decline in our flocks since the year 1900. Wool has been so cheap that the lands have been turned from pastures to grain, and we now find some of our best grain-producing areas in the great plains where thirty years ago there were only cattle and sheep. Intensive agriculture is breaking up the sheep ranges of the West. They are being divided into homesteads and fenced so that the sheep that eight pounds is the average estimate of the fleece of the United States as given by our wool experts, it will be seen what these figures mean. McCaughey's $5,000 ram had so much wool that its ears were entirely hidden, and the fleece came out three inches over its eyes, so that it looked out at the world through these two little holes in its head. I stuck my finger into the fleece and had to press my whole fist in before I could reach the skin.

Mr. McCaughey believed that the fleeces of all sheep could be greatly increased. He told me that he had raised the average output of wool per sheep in some of his flocks from seven pounds to fifteen. He had as many as 20,000 sheep in one flock, and it is easy to see that an increase of only two pounds per fleece for that flock would add 40,000 pounds to his clip. If we could increase our average fleece half as much as Mr. McCaughey did, the additional wool would supply the annual output of a million soldiers and give each of them every article mentioned at the first of this letter.

Where fleeces are turned into gold. Shearing sheep by machinery man must have open trails to move his flocks from the winter grazing grounds to the forest reserves, where they feed in the summer. The total number of sheep now in the United States is about 48,500,000, and there is only one farm of over twenty acres in every seven that supports a sheep.

As to the sheep of the whole world, here is a census by continents that is approximately correct: North America, 55,600,000; South America, 112,700,000; Europe, 174,000,000; Asia, 110,000,000; Africa, 51,000,000; Australasia, 109,000,000. Almost nine-tenths of the sheep in North America are found in the United States, and almost all of those of South America graze on the basin of the Rio de la Plata. The chief sheep country of South America is Argentina. It has 80,000,000 sheep and it gives us a large part of our wool. As to Europe, almost half the sheep of that continent are in Russia.

THE biggest pasture on earth is Australia, which at the time the war began had more than 85,000,000 sheep and was annually producing more than 600,000,000 pounds of wool. The sheep of Australia are remarkable for the increased product of wool cut from one animal and the high prices paid at the sales. The farmers there give more for blooded sheep than do those of any other country. When I was in Sydney a few years ago, the sheep men told me that it was not uncommon for a well-bred ram to sell for $2,000 and upward, and that a number of instances had occurred in which rams have sold for 1,000 guineas, or more than $5,000. In 1896 the ram President, owned by James Gibson, sold for $8,000, while a year later the same man sold Royalist for $5,000. At that time Mr. Gibson got an average of $830 for a flock of sheep he brought to the sales, and prior to that time he had received on the average $1,290 for each sheep at one auction.

A GREAT many of the fine sheep of Australia are brought from Vermont. I met one Australian squatter who valued his Vermont sheep at $250 a head. This was Samuel McCaughey, who at that time owned more sheep than any other man in the world. He had a round million, and some of his flocks cut on the average as much as twenty-two pounds, and at one shearing he sold a million and a quarter pounds of wool. I saw one of his rams at a stock show which had, I was told, at least forty-five pounds of wool on it, and at the same time saw ewes wearing thirty-pound fleeces. When it is remembered risen to 29 cents. Last year the average price per pound was just under 55 cents, and today it is selling for more than that. Sheep have trebled in value, and there is more money in sheep-raising than there has been at any time in our history. The agricultural experts tell me that we could easily double our sheep population.

Not only the Department of Agriculture, but several patriotic wool associations as well, have organized a movement to increase our product of mutton and wool. Among the latter are the National Sheep and Wool Bureau and the More-Sheep-More-Wool Association of the United States. Secretary Houston has sheep specialists who are traveling over the country lecturing to the farmers on sheep husbandry, and he is planning to organize boys' and girls' sheep clubs as a part of the extension farm movement of every state. He is especially anxious to increase the flocks in New York and New England, and also in West Virginia, North Carolina, Texas and Michigan.

It is especially desired that the farmer east of the Missouri River raise more sheep. The expert says that 25,000,000 more ewes can be kept there at a profit, and that if this is done it will greatly help the meat supply for ourselves and our allies. It will also add 200,000,000 pounds more wool to our annual clip, now several hundred million pounds short every year.

JUST now some of the finest wool of the world is the merino raised on the high, dry lands of Australia and South Africa. The sheep of Algeria and Morocco grow excellent wool, and so also do those of Asia Minor and Persia, as well as those which graze on the highlands of the Andes. Our Ohio and Pennsylvania sheep produce some of the strongest wool in the world. They are chiefly merinos, and they pasture on the sod-covered land. Our Michigan and New York wools are almost as good, and after them come the wools from Kentucky, Indiana, Missouri and Wisconsin. There is a special grade for Texas wool, and also for certain wools of Oregon and California. We have one grade known as "territory wool," which comes from the great range states of the West, such as Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Nevada and Colorado. Much of that wool is from sheep which feed on the high plateaus, where the wind blows sand and dirt into the fleeces. It is related that one sand-storm which came up while the men were shearing a flock caused them to stop work for an hour, and that at the end of the storm the average weight of the fleece had risen from six to nine pounds.

Nation's Industries Halt to Save Fuel

FOR several days prior to January 16, the general public was dimly conscious of the fact that the much tangled coal and freight situation was going to require a radical remedy. There were suggestions that a single holiday each week might be necessary in order to relieve the steady load on transportation interests and permit deliveries to catch up with needs, but no one was prepared for the interruption of commercial life involved in the drastic order published in the adjoining column issued by Dr. Garfield by authority of the President on January 16. The announcement stunned the country. We had been making war without feeling war's necessities. We had been putting up with late trains, delayed mails and empty coal-bins. We had faced the worries of the day with the confident assurance that before many tomorrows things would come right again as they always had before. We had not counted on the storm king and we had forgotten that more than a million of the men who might have been at work at untangling this situation had been taken out of our commercial life, to form the first divisions of America's great Army of Liberty. With storm following storm in the Middle West, with railroad equipment—already somewhat wobbly due to lack of mechanics to keep it in proper repair—breaking down, with unprecedented ice floes in the Hudson River blocking delivery to the metropolis and to New England of hundreds of thousands of tons of coal in the terminals at tide-water, and with labor short in every field, the country was fast approaching an impossible situation in which complete congestion would have threatened utter paralysis of all industry. Just what facts those responsible in Washington had before them, just why so radical a departure as a five days' holiday should have been thought the only way out, nobody outside the inner councils can tell; but the temper of the country is indicated by the expression of the press, which was one of protest coupled with ready compliance.

On January 17 protests flooded the wires. Boards of Trade, Congressmen, industrial organizations sought for delay or modification of the order, but the President left the matter entirely in the hands of Dr. Garfield, who having satisfied himself that the necessary course had been chosen, lashed his helm down and went full speed ahead. The formal order was signed at 5.45 p. m. on the seventeenth. At 6.05 p. m. the Senate passed a resolution requesting that the order be delayed for five days, during which time investigation should develop the imperative necessity of such a wrenching of the industrial fabric. This resolution had been offered by Senator Hitchcock early in the day, and voting on it had waited on the report of a committee which heard Dr. Garfield. He told the committee that the order had been issued to alleviate human suffering, to allow ships waiting at ports to coal up and carry supplies to our Allies, and to relieve congested conditions of the railroads and move coal and food. He said he had anticipated objections but had taken the action after conference with Secretary McAdoo and the War and Navy Departments. A similar resolution asking delay in the enforcement of this order, failed to reach a vote in the House on the seventeenth and on the eighteenth no further action was taken although both Congressmen and Senators expressed doubts as to the wisdom of the action.

It was estimated that in the territory east of the Mississippi River the industrial activities of 68,000,000 people would be halted, that more than 6,000,000 wage-earners would lose all or part of their normal earnings for the five days, since many large employers were unable to heed Dr. Garfield's request and pay wages for the lost days, and that 220,000 plants representing over

Business Shut Down to Save Coal

THE Fuel Administration on January 16 ordered closed down for five days substantially all manufacturing industries east of the Mississippi River, as a measure for the conservation of coal.

In addition the order specified the ten Mondays from January 21 to March 25, inclusive, as legal holidays, and closely restricted the use of coal, in effect ordering the closing of stores, theaters and office buildings on those days.

This official order provides substantially as follows:

Until further order of the United States Fuel Administrator, all persons selling fuel in whatever capacity shall give preference to orders for necessary requirements,

(a) Of railroads; (b) of domestic consumers, hospitals, charitable institutions and army and navy cantonments; (c) of public utilities, telephones, and telegraph plants; (d) of ships and vessels for bunker purposes; (e) of the United States for strictly Governmental purposes, not including orders from or for factories or plants working on contracts for the United States; (f) of municipal, county, or State Governments for necessary public uses; (g) of manufacturers of perishable food or of food for necessary immediate consumption.

The order further provides that on January 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22, 1918, no fuel shall be delivered for any other use until the requirements included in the list shall have been first delivered.

On January 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22, 1918, and also on each and every Monday beginning January 28, 1918, and continuing up to and including March 25, 1918, no manufacturing plant shall burn fuel or use power derived from fuel for any purpose except—

(a) Such plants as must be continuously operated to avoid serious injury to the plant itself or its contents; (b) manufacturers of perishable foods; (c) manufacturers of food not perishable and not in immediate demand, who may burn fuel to such extent as may be authorized by the Fuel Administrator; (d) printers or publishers of daily papers may burn fuel as usual excepting on the Monday holidays, on which days they may burn fuel to such extent as is necessary to issue such editions as such papers customarily issue on important national legal holidays; (e) printing establishments which may burn fuel on January 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 to such extent as is necessary to issue current numbers of magazines.

On each Monday beginning January 21, 1918, and continuing up to and including Monday, March 25, 1918, no fuel shall be burned (except to such extent as is essential to prevent injury to property from freezing) for the purpose of supplying heat for:

(a) Any business or professional offices, except offices used by the United States, State, County, or municipal Governments, transportation companies, or which are occupied by banks and trust companies or by physicians or dentists; (b) wholesale or retail stores, or any other stores, except food stores which may maintain necessary heat until 12 o'clock noon; drug stores, which may maintain necessary heat throughout the day and evening; (c) theaters, moving picture houses and any other places of amusement.

On the above specified Mondays no fuel shall be burned for the purpose of heating rooms or buildings in which liquor is sold. No fuel shall be burned to furnish local transportation in excess of the amount used on the Sundays previous thereto. The order provides that nothing in this order shall be held to forbid the burning of fuel to heat rooms or such portions of buildings as are used in connection with the production or distribution of fuel.

The State Fuel Administrators are authorized to issue special orders for relief, where necessary, to prevent injury to health or injury to property by fire or freezing. The order is effective in all of the territory of the United States east of the Mississippi River, including the whole of the States of Louisiana and Minnesota.

$19,000,000,000 of invested capital would be made idle. Many papers feared that this five days' idleness would destroy the small margin of surplus of many thousands of workers already sorely pressed by the rising cost of necessities and that this would seriously affect sales of the next Liberty Bond offer, but whatever the arguments most of the papers finally came back to the expression that it must be necessary for the ultimate good of the country or it yards and plants working on gas masks, tenting and uniform materials and other immediately necessary government requirements, were exempted from the closing order. It was reported on the day previous to the issue of the order that more than 200,000 loaded cars were held up in terminals or delayed in transit. President Wilson, on the eighteenth, issued a statement fully supporting Dr. Garfield's action and declaring it imperatively necessary.

What Was Lincoln's Faith?

NO man, without God, could have risen to the heights of greatness of the Emancipator. Next week Dr. Edmond Fremont Albertson gives us the vital evidence in "Lincoln and His Religion."

Maynard Owen Williams has had the rare privilege of intimate personal touch with the Russian nation of today. He has seen the peasant in his villages, at work on his land, loafing on his job, organized into armies, and disorganized into mobs.

would not have been ordered, and that a small catastrophe to be followed by full speed ahead was better than a great catastrophe to be followed by utter confusion. The spirit was one of loyal acquiescence in every necessary regulation, and the firm determination to do everything individually or collectively which might answer for the winning of the war. Munition plants were to have been closed along with the others, but on the eighteenth these plants, the shipmaiden name and that these documents revealed intrigues for peace in the interest of Germany and business. On the next day Secretary Lansing in Washington, following reports from Paris that America had evidence to offer, made public dispatches from Count von Luxburg in Argentine and Count von Bernstorff in Washington that indicated a certain kindly interest in this French statesman. Caillaux came under suspicion in the settlement of the Agadir incident and had been trailed for a couple of years by French Secret Service agents, being suspected of dealings with the enemy.

BRITISH LABOR BACKS BOLSHEVIKI. The British Labor party on January 15 sent a message to the Russian people and made an appeal to the peoples of Central Europe through the medium of the Russian Bolsheviki. In this statement the British Laborites declared themselves willing to accept the Russian principle, of self-determination of peoples and no annexation or indemnities, for the British Empire particularly in Middle East Africa and India. They declared that the primary interests of dynasties or the desire of the Teutonic governing classes to dominate other classes and nationalities, "must no more be suffered to prevent self-determination in Central Europe and thereby imperil it in Europe as a whole than the interests of British imperialism or capitalism must be suffered to do elsewhere." British labor declared that the refusal of the Germans to accept the principle of self-determination for peoples in the negotiations at Brest-Litovsk represented a crisis in the war and that in this crisis the British people must support the people of Russia. They reminded the Russian people that Great Britain, taught by the loss of the American colonies, was the first modern state to grant complete determination to any group of its inhabitants as illustrated by the self-governing dominions. They declared that they were even willing to extend this principle to Ireland, although the same day's news indicated that the Irish convention was about to end in a failure unless the representatives of Ulster rose to the occasion. British labor went on record as favoring the placing of all tropical Africa under uniform international control.

FOR A MUNITIONS DIRECTOR. The testimony of Secretary Baker before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs as given in this page last week not only failed to reassure the committee but gave great impetus to a movement gathering force in Congress for a Munitions Director, the placing in the hands of one man of all of the responsibilities for the purchasing of all military supplies for the government. Plans vary from a Munitions Secretary, with a seat in the Cabinet, to a Department under the Secretary of War, but the opinion is freely expressed that the testimony brought out by the committee indicated a serious condition, of incompetency and inability to make speed. The American War Department, it was felt, must be freed of departmental red tape and all other handicaps of outworn precedent. The President was reported as opposed to an additional Cabinet member. The situation of the Navy, which had equipped 1100 vessels with guns and crews to operate them, which had sent abroad several regiments of marines fully equipped in every detail with American made material, including the much discussed Lewis machine-guns, which had succeeded in securing ample supplies of clothing of all descriptions without compromise of quality, while the War Department had authorized the use of certain proportions of shoddy, all of which was explained as being due to 25 years of effort to find the best way to do a thing in the quickest way, was

The Knight of a Better Day

By
LOUIS E. ORCUTT

IT was a celebrated case. All of West Virginia knew its every detail. The uncle who had died was known in every valley about Huntington; the nephew who almost died, and who was held for the murder although he pleaded self-defense, was known as well. He had prospered and had friends. As a traveling salesman he stood at the top of the list, and his trade swore by him because it trusted him. Every day of the trial was pictured on the minds of West Virginia, and when this prosperous nephew, recovered from his wounds, had been heard in his plea of self-defense and was finally adjudged guilty and sentenced to five years in State Prison, West Virginia agreed that it was too bad, and then forgot. But not quite.

The man in prison did not forget. Every day of those five years he looked forward to that bright and happy day when he should walk the earth again, a free man among his fellows, and take up once more that progress toward success which one night's terror had blocked for years. Old friends met him with ready hands, and from one he borrowed $500; from another he secured a set of samples and started out on the road to see his old customers. Without exception these merchants greeted him as one returned from the dead, protested their earnest desire to help him in every way possible, but refused absolutely to buy goods from him. Many of them offered to lend him money, and many others advised him to go away some place and start in again where he was not known. "You see," they told him, "if it should become known that we were doing business with a former criminal, people wouldn't patronize our store."

At the end of six months this man returned to Huntington sore at heart, disappointed, with $14 in his pocket and a tremendous resolution in his heart. Society had asked of him a certain measure of reparation for the wrong which it charged against him. He had paid the price; yet it seemed that the mark of Cain was on him and that the doors of honest effort were closed against him, though he had had influence and position. How much worse must it be for those other unknown thousands who also had paid the price and who should come out of prison seeking as he did to make an honest man's living among men?

HE sought out one friend, John W. Koontz, on whom he knew he could count. He told him that he had $14, which was just enough to incorporate a society under the laws of West Virginia. The friend knew him too well to dissuade him, and loved him well enough to share with him the burdens and cares, the worries and triumphs of this new society, the need of which had been so thoroughly proven in the six months' struggle. And so the Prisoners' Relief Society of Huntington, W. Va., came into being.

It had and still has just one programme in the world: the placing in honest employment of men who have finished their terms in prison. It was not hard to find the men; it was a super-human task to find places for them. For although business was not quite heartless, business men as a whole were disinclined to employ men with criminal records. They were too busy to investigate a man to determine the nature of his crime, the degree of his guilt, or the validity of his penitence. As a matter of safety they chose for positions of trust only those who had never violated trust. They admitted that it was fine to give a man a new chance, but they felt that it was dangerous; and this being a case in which they could hardly be insured, they did not take the risk.

The first work, therefore, of the Prisoners' Relief Society, which became largely the work of the founder, was to secure places for such men as might seek them at his hands. He went up and down the country calling on the heads of great industries, the managers of railroads, manufacturers, captains of industry. Usually he went in the interest of some particular case, and seldom did he fail to place his man. In one particular instance, the president of a great railroad system had refused to give employment to a man who had committed murder. He said, "I never could feel safe if I knew there was a murderer in the office." Mr. Dudding (for it is of Earle E. Dudding that we are talking) asked him if he had been uncomfortable during the last forty-five minutes. The railroad president said that "he had not passed a pleasanter forty-five minutes in his life." "Well," said Mr. Dudding, "you spent that forty-five minutes with a murderer." The great executive was nonplussed. He had no more arguments to make. The man got the job and made good at it.

WHILE placing men Mr. Dudding is always constantly under the necessity of raising funds for the work, for the service which the Prisoners' Relief Society renders to former prisoners is rendered without charge to them. Many a time the treasury has been more than empty, but always providence has filled it again. One providence came in the form of a slip of a girl, some inches less than five feet, frail in frame but indomitable in purpose. Letha Watts became the office manager of the Prisoners' Relief Society when it had only an office, considerable correspondence, immeasurable opportunities, and Earle Dudding. It had no money, but hundreds of letters were coming weekly from men who needed help.

Mr. Dudding started out in search of financial support, leaving Miss Watts in charge. She was an expert stenographer. She knew of a number of girls who wanted to learn. She marshaled them into the empty office, borrowed typewriters for them to use, gave them instructions in return for their service, and answered that accumulated mail, some of which was from persons who sought to help rather than to be helped. At the end of a few weeks, Dudding reached New York discouraged, disheartened, broke—he had made the journey from Chicago on the trucks and truss-roads—almost ready to give up and take the short cut for eternity. He had told Miss Watts to write him at the McAlpin. There were some letters waiting. He was dirty, unshaven and unkempt, and had real difficulty in explaining to the clerk at the hotel that he was the man for whom the letters were intended.

The first letter he opened was from Letha Watts, and out of it fell a check for $25, and from it came the cheering news that there was $600 more in the bank.

THAT was some years ago. Now Miss Watts, having given the full measure of her frail physique to the work of finding opportunities for men from prison, has been forced by ill-health to leave the work that she loves, and the doctors say that her days here are to be few. But her work, together with that of Mr. Dudding, has become a great enterprise, an enterprise which has thoroughly justified itself, a going enterprise which will continue to go so long as men have hearts and other men have needs, and men and women are willing to help a man who seeks to help himself.

Although the Prisoners' Relief Society has placed nearly 5,000 men, out of this number only the smallest fraction has failed to make good.

The society today has on its list of employers willing to take former prisoners as new employees almost all of the railroads and hundreds of the great manufacturing institutions and mercantile establishments of the country. Some concerns now have twenty to thirty Dudding men. In the city of Detroit over 500 of them are proving themselves more than worthy of a second chance.

The Dudding system is different than that of the commercial employment agencies. Men about to be released from prison are given blanks to be filled out, one by themselves and the other by the warden. Following the receipt of these blanks thorough investigation is made to assure the society that the man is "on the square." This investigation and the information furnished by the man himself usually discloses some line of work for which the applicant is best fitted. Letters are then sent out to all the concerns listed as willing to take such men and who employ men of the class of the applicant. The return mail usually brings from one to three or four opportunities for honest employment, so that when a prisoner is given his release from the prison and steps forward again a free man, he is given at once full instructions how to proceed to the place where he is to receive employment. Thus he goes directly to his new work, and there is no chance for him to be blackmailed, as are so many ex-prisoners, by men who know their records and who extort money from them under constant threat of exposure. There is nothing left to expose. The office knows all about it and doesn't care.

AS we have said before (almost without exception) these men make good. There is one other reason for their making good, and that is the fact that every attempt is made to place men in positions for which they are fitted. The man who has been an executive is found an executive position, the book-keeper is placed again at his accounts, the machinist feels under his hand once more the heartening jarr of vibrating machinery, the railroad man is back on the road, the salesman once more with his samples in his case, and the bank clerk again finds himself in the atmosphere of checks, drafts and bills of exchange. Nor does Dudding forget his men. He keeps in touch with them and they with him. If difficulties develop, Dudding helps push them aside. He has only begun to help a man when he has secured him a job.

It has recently been found necessary to transfer the headquarters of the Prisoners' Relief Society from Huntington, W. Va., to Washington, D. C. There the society should be more fully equipped to render prompt and efficient service to the men who need it. This service is threefold—to the men from the prisons, to the employers, and to the nation. To the men it gives a chance to be men among men, to win again the respect of their fellows forfeited through some mad caprice, or money loss, or through drugs, or drink; to the employers it brings men when men are greatly needed, and to the nation it returns producers where, by the rules of the game, it would have given confirmed criminals. Without such help as the Prisoners' Relief Society is able to give, nine men out of ten would be forced by the false standards of critical society away from honest employment, which is denied them, to the dishonest employment which alone is left to them. Were it possible for the opportunity given through the Prisoners' Relief Society to become nationwide, 999 out of 1,000 released prisoners would be lost forever to lives of crime; for the first-timer is seldom a criminal at heart, and many men who know best declare that very few are criminals at heart, although many have not had the courage to fight the attitude of the world against those who have gone astray and have again and again gone wrong because they had no fair chance to go right.

DUDDING and the Prisoners' Relief Society are recreating men. Its door is the open gate of opportunity, but like every other enterprise which seeks only to serve and seeks nothing for itself, the society is handicapped by the lack of sufficient funds. Just now it faces a critical situation. The great industrial concerns which it serves are not unmindful of its value to them and do not intend that it should suffer, but the number of men to be served is constantly increasing, and money, the golden cord, is the only thread that can lead men to opportunity. We do not know of any more Christ-like charity than this, or of a more real service rendered at such small comparative cost. The last letter we had from Dudding reported more than 600 applications waiting attention because of lack of money. Facing the greatest opportunity of its career, the society is practically halted. Every day's mail brings more appeals for help, yet Dudding's hands are tied for lack of cash, and in his extremity he gives the sign of distress to his old friends of the Christian Herald.

In the earlier days of the Prisoners' Relief Society the Christian Herald had a great deal to do with its success; and now that it has made good and faces a greater opportunity, important to the nation, which needs to foster every effort that will develop its man-power, we feel assured that many members of the Christian Herald Family will be glad to help make certain the finest possible service to the men who have paid the price of their misdeeds and are now seeking a new chance among men. One hundred patrons, willing to invest $10 a year in this work, would put it on a permanent basis. The expense is not large. Incidental receipts will be sufficient to keep the bills paid, if the $1,000 is assured. The Prisoners' Relief Society takes no pride in a large budget. It pays no fancy salaries; it serves men; it serves the country; it lives for service only. Will you not be one to help Dudding help men?

The Christian Herald will be glad to forward any money which members of the Christian Herald Family may wish to invest in restored manhood and rebuilt lives.

On the Pathway of Hope

ALTHOUGH he did not walk in mail and did not wear a sword, He was a knight, a knight who dared to battle for the Lord; Although he did not hold aloft a shield of burnished brass, His goodness was the sort of shield that evil cannot pass. He trusted men and searched their hearts, and looked for hidden worth— And showed them that they had a place to fill upon the earth. He dealt in faith instead of gold, and looked for souls to save, And offered refuge to the ones who feared a nameless grave.

He was a knight although at times he walked in shabby dress, A knight who always found the time to worship, and to bless His Maker's name. He was a knight who blazed a pathway wide To an abode of hopefulness, and bade men come inside. And there were those who followed him who long had dealt in sin, And there were those who long had strayed, who feared to enter in; But there were those who found again the strength to kneel and pray, The strength to throw their shoulders back, and smile, and face the day!

Although he did not walk in mail and did not wear a sword, He was a knight who gave his all to battle for the Lord.

The Factor in the Fight

A SERMONIC ADDRESS BY REV. IRA DWIGHT LYTTLE*

THERE may be many factors entering into the scheme of things, as we see it; but generally there is one big thing that takes the place, and the others are, in many cases, simple by-products. Often, if we succeed, we can look back and determine the factor; but if we fail to succeed, either the failure disheartens us, or we are so busy seeking success along other lines that we hardly take into consideration that there was an "element, circumstance, or influence" somewhere that brought about the failure, which, had it been determined and dealt with, would have spelled success.

And so, there is a big factor in the fight. Do you ask, "What fight?" Why, there is only one fight. All the world's battles of the past were but mere skirmishes compared with the fight that is now on. It is not our intention to enter into the prophetic significance of the world war; but I think we can very properly say it is not an accident. When the word was flashed around the world, that August morning, that Great Britain had declared war on the Central Powers, there were many people to whom this announcement seemed like a voice speaking out of the Infinite. To some it meant the end; to others the beginning. But, like all other occurrences, there was and is a factor. And this factor has as much to do with the ending of this conflict as with its beginning. It was the failure of the nations to determine this factor that brought about the war, and it is the failure of the participants to recognize this same factor that prolongs the war.

TO go back to the beginning. There have been the usual charges and counter-charges by the militant parties. We say, and probably shall continue to say, the Kaiser was responsible. That is as far back, perhaps, as we can see; but might it not be that the Kaiser himself is a result rather than a cause? Would it not be well for us to remember that back of the Kaiser and his kultur, back of the unrest in many parts of the world, back of the terrible chaos in Russia, back of the blood that has drenched the sod of Europe these three years; yes, back of all the trouble and distress, the warfare and famine, the sadness and suffering which this old world has ever known, there is one big factor, which, if determined and reckoned with, means success; if not reckoned with, it means disaster. And this one big factor is the spiritual: in other words, it is God!

Let us go back and see what the history of the past has to say in the matter. What gave the Hebrew people the prominence they enjoyed among the nations of the earth? We say they were the chosen nation; but that does not take us very far when it comes to determining the factor. And their being the chosen people does not mean that God placed his hand upon them in an arbitrary manner, while disregarding the other nations of the earth; but it does indicate that they had a capacity or fitness for the special work of the One Living and True God. You may say that God gave this capacity or fitness, and so in the last analysis it was an arbitrary choice on the part of God; but we must not lose sight of the fact that capacity or fitness does not preclude an exercise of the will. Those people could have done then just what they did hundreds of years later; they could have said "no" to God. Instead of this, the big, all-important factor in every phase of their national life was the spiritual. Everything was brought into subordination to this. We find the whole web of Hebrew life woven about one central thought, the tabernacle, which represented the spiritual worship of Jehovah. What was the result? Any Bible student can answer this question. In fact, we may get the answer from secular history, if we wish. As long as these people recognized God as the Alpha and the Omega of their life—while their life, instead of being "shaped after" the spiritual, was spiritual—they had success. It was the working out of the old covenant promise, "I will be unto you a God, and you shall be unto me a people." Their spirituality was not the result of their being chosen of God; God chose them because they were spiritual. Then, when they transgressed his laws, allowing the spiritual factor to sink out of sight, their troubles were many, and God reminded them again and again of the definite relationship between these things. The big factor in the life of the Hebrew was the spiritual.

If the Hebrews were the spiritual people among the nations of the earth, the prophets were the spiritual class among the Hebrews. They were the wheel within the wheel. There are no Old Testament writings that rise so high as the writings of the prophets. To them God was life, and life was God. How quick they were to trace the troubles of the nation back to the disregard of God's claims! Isaiah tells them that they were insulting God by offering sacrifices, and keeping holy days, and attending the solemn assembly. Why? The same answer: God was being left out. They went on and made their plans for the future; but the prophet told them they would be cut short, and they were. Right down through the writings of these men of God, it was ever the same. Malachi in a word tells them the secret of all their individual and national troubles. Flocks and herds roamed on the hillside; but the increase was nil. Through years of carelessness, they had even forgotten that there might be a connection between these losses and their failure to pay their homage to Jehovah; and so we hear the prophet charge them with having robbed God. The prophets saw that the whole trouble with the people was simply that they failed to count God into the scheme of living.

AND when, centuries later, these people had sunk so far into formalism that their very sense of the spiritual had become atrophied, John the Baptist and Jesus came upon the scene with the message that has ever been the hope of the world: seek first the things of the Spirit. When they flocked to the Jordan to be baptized, he told them they were not getting started right, indicating that even though they could trace their lineage back to Abraham, this would not be sufficient, as they still might be destitute of the moral sense. Jesus takes up the message of John, and almost the first thing he says to them is: "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." This call to repentance was the call to turn about and get a spiritual view of life. By this time the people were materialists of the rankest sort. They interpreted life in perishable terms; Jesus interpreted it in terms of the spirit. To these people, God was an absentee, who had set the universe in motion and relegated himself to a throne "somewhere in heaven"; to Jesus he was the Ever-present Father. They felt that God, if he had any interest in them at all, was not interested in the small things; but Jesus taught that He was so intimately interested in them that even the very hairs of their heads were numbered. He sought to bring them to the mount of transfiguration, where they might see God and understand life in its true meaning; but they refused to walk this way with Him, even when he pointed out to them that their refusal meant national ruin. One of the saddest hours in the life of Jesus was when he wept over Jerusalem, the city of his hopes and his love. "How oft would I have gathered thee together!" The pathos of these words cannot perhaps be understood by us; but enough is expressed to show that the great longing of his life was to lift them up to that higher ground, where they could dominate in the true sense, because they were dominated by the spiritual. They had left out the big factor, the spiritual.

THE great Reformation is another of the outstanding illustrations that the spiritual is the dominating factor. If the early Catholic Church had any spirituality, it had become a dead letter. The church had become the instrument of man to further his aims and ends. Corruption was rampant. Many of the men who bore the vessels of the Lord were men whose corrupt lives were lived in such open and flagrant violation of the principles of righteousness that God existed only in their ritual. The Reformation may mean many things, but one thing is written all over the movement: it is the spiritual in the ascendancy. The great movement left many things to be desired; but life has certainly been sweeter and religion has meant more for the world, since the priest on the steps of the Romish church shouted: "The just shall live by faith!" Here was the champion of the spiritual issuing his ultimatum.

And now for the factor in the fight. Where do we stand today, after three and a half years of the bitterest warfare the world has ever known? Millions of men are in arms, and millions have been slain. Widows and orphans by countless thousands think day and night of lonely mounds "somewhere in France," where the ones who meant more to them than life itself have been laid away to rest. And now the war lords tell us that there may be years more of this slaughter that has almost threatened civilization itself.

Why is it? Have you never asked yourself in the quiet of the night why all this has taken place?

Three and a half years of world war! Think of it! Thousands of men falling daily! Churches being destroyed, art treasures stolen and reckoned as the legitimate fruits of conquest! Miles and miles of the fairest portion of God's good earth uprooted until it looks like a field where swine are herded! Millions of dollars going up in smoke of the battle every hour of the day and night! Think of it again, and yet again! What does it all mean? Who is responsible for it? Will the crushing of Prussian militarism solve this world problem? Our head grows dizzy, and we seem almost stupefied when we stop for a moment to think of these things.

BUT a far-reaching and very pertinent question just now is this: Do we even understand this cataclysm? Here and there are a few who, perhaps, may be able to see back of the immediate causes, and so get nearer to the real meaning; but have men ever understood any of the great world events? What did the years of plague mean to England? Did men understand the real meaning of the Reformation? Has the full significance of the French revolution ever dawned upon any of us?

We hear a lot of talk about reading between the lines. In this present war God is writing. And one of the things that he has written big and bold, like the handwriting on the wall, is the charge that fits Briton and Teuton, Frank and Roman, alike. And that charge may be put in the words: "The world by wisdom knew not God!"

Way back of all the immediate causes of this conflict there is that "element, circumstance, or influence": the world had lost its sense of the relationship to God. Materialism was the bright star. It was not that we had counted God out. We had not recognized Him at all; we failed to count in the spiritual factor, and history is repeating itself in the bloodshed and sorrow and sufferings of mankind.

The only way for the world to be made safe for democracy is for the world to come back to God—count in the spiritual in the scheme of world life.

THE question as to when the war will cease cannot be answered by any man. Only a conditional approximation can be given, and that is that the war will cease and the world be made safe when the world itself has been conquered by God. This old world does not belong to the Kaiser, or Great Britain, or France, or any combination of nations; it is God's peculiar property, and is spiritual because God is Spirit. God's purpose is a spiritual purpose.

Materialism in one form or another has blocked the path of progress and discouraged the people of God and created pessimists. Some tell us the world is growing better, others that it is growing worse. But whether the world is better or worse is not the big question just at present. There is another matter that we should weigh carefully, and it is simply this: God is somewhere in this fight! We may disregard a factor, but that does not put the factor out of existence. Otherwise Germany would have annihilated God with her heresy and militarism long ago.

God is in this fight!

I am taking this great conflict as another sentence in the message of God. He is speaking as he has spoken before, only more loudly. He wants to be heard, and will no doubt continue to speak until the world hears and stands ready to say, "We delight to do thy will, O Lord."

PEACE there will doubtless be some day. The nations cannot keep this up indefinitely. Fighting on such a gigantic scale cannot continue much longer; but unless the world hears the message of God, and reckons in the greatest factor the ages have ever had to consider, it will only be an armistice, not a real peace.

Battleships and standing armies will not make the world safe for democracy. These things have had their day. The only thing that can save the world now, and safeguard it for the future, is a recognition of the spiritual. The old ultimatum, "The nation or people that will not serve God shall perish," is just as true today as it ever has been. The five great empires of antiquity were great in all things but the one thing needful—they lacked God. Today their history is all that remains, for they are but names traced in the dust of their dead. And the same God who thus dealt with these nations of the past is the God who deals with nations today. It is not an arbitrary setting up of one nation and the casting down of another. Far from it. A nation, just as truly as an individual, decides its own destiny. What the nations become as the result of this war depends entirely upon how they treat the spiritual factor in the fight.

The Valley of Vision

SUNDAY, February 3. Isa. 22 : 5. "The valley of vision." That is a very strange conjunction. We could have understood the phrase had it been "The hill of vision." It is the mountain summit which is usually associated with outlook. One remembers "the high hill, called Clear," where Christian and Hopeful could dimly see the gates and also some of the glory of the Celestial City. But here it is the valley which is the home of vision. The outlook is given in seeming imprisonment. We are shut in by surrounding hills, and our sight attains finer perception and range. The limitation becomes the minister of expansion. The big wonder is born in a narrow place. I remember my surprise when I paid my first visit to the Tower of London. At one point we were taken along a narrow dingy passage which opened into the gloomy chamber where the crown jewels were kept. One was almost startled to see those flashing jewels in such confined and gray surroundings; but a similar wonder often startles the saint when, in some gloomy valley experiences, there flash upon him the unsearchable riches of Christ.

And now take this word from the spiritual experience of Horace Bushnell. "I have learned more of experimental religion since my little boy died than in all my life before." Bushnell had had many rare experiences on the mountain-top, but they were nothing to the visions that were unveiled to him in the valley. The darker school gave him the finer sight. And may we not reverently remember the word which is spoken of our Lord, that "He learned obedience by the things which he suffered." That mysterious enrichment came to him in the valley. And indeed we may be perfectly sure that millions of God's children have found enlargement in the valley. They have begun to see, or they have strengthened their sight, in the very season when they were blinded with tears. It is in the valley that we see into the heart of God. There are narrow roads in the valley in which we share "the fellowship of his sufferings."

So that when we are led into somber valleys let us humbly and expectantly assume that we are in the place of vision. Maybe the Lord is going to anoint our eyes with eye-salve, and he will impart unto us one of his secrets. Perhaps it was needful that we should be led into the valley in order that we might receive our sight. And thus life's valleys will be found to be the abodes of the divine mercy as well as those breezy heights which catch the first beams of the rising sun. Even in the valley we may see the King in his beauty, and the land that is very far off.

Justification by Love

MONDAY, February 4. Num. 23 : 21. "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the Lord his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them." Here we have, fourteen centuries before the Christian era, intimations of two doctrines of grace, that of imputed righteousness, justification by faith, and that of adoption into God's family. When we speak of imputed righteousness, we represent God as seeing no fault in one who is not yet perfect. We think of God as treating one who is still struggling for moral victory as though he had already attained. The unbeliever says there is no such thing as justification by faith in the realm of reason, and he is right. Reason, calm, cold, unimpassioned, admits no such possibility as that of treating an offender as though he had not offended. But reason is not all. "The heart has reasons which reason itself never knew." There is love, and love prompts us to impute perfection to imperfect characters. In other words, love enables us to justify those who are not just. What does the world say to this? The world accepts it. Indeed, the world, at its best, practices the doctrine of justification by love. The world can not deny it, for we see it daily. The love of a fond mother overlooks, excuses, and even justifies the imperfections of her child. Justified by love! The doctrine of Protestant Christianity makes God a great Father who forgives the faults of his children because of their faith in him and because their faith in him helps them to struggle daily to leave their faults behind them. The gift of the grace of God makes it possible for children of earth to be also children of heaven. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God." "We have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." Each of us has an earthly heredity. We may have a heavenly heredity. C. C. A.

Prayer for Pardon

TUESDAY, February 5. Ps. 32 : 6. "For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found." The thing for which the godly pray God is pardon for their trespasses. David had obtained that pardon after his gross misstep. He remembered with shame the great error into which he had allowed himself to be led, and recalled with a keen sense of pain the agony of remorse and contrition that had followed.

It was a great mercy that God showed this royal sinner, that he did not become engulfed in despair and abandon himself utterly to reckless living. God did not entirely withdraw his hand from him, but taught him to pray for forgiveness and humble himself. To do this David declares the characteristic of a godly person. True godliness has its roots in the pardoning mercy of God, in that act of God which wipes out the accusing record of our past wrongdoing.

The heart which sues for pardon is a heart that has become horrified at sin, not only the particular sin which had just been committed, but sin in general. It is wary of sinning afresh, it is on its guard against new temptations. And thus it continues and grows in godliness. Sanctifying grace is bestowed upon the pardoned sinner for his holy living. The sinner whose prayer for pardon God accepted never forgets the great mercy shown him. That act becomes a great power in his entire subsequent life. W. H. T. D.

Happiness

WEDNESDAY, February 6. James 5 : 11. "Behold, we count them happy which endure." Happiness is one of the objects of creation. God wants all his children to enjoy him and his dominion forever. Each individual has his own peculiar idea regarding what will make him happy and is willing to sacrifice much to attain his ideal. The child thinks of its toy, the youth of his sports, manhood of his goal, power, success and ambition; old age, of a comfortable home and support. But nothing of a temporary or material nature will long satisfy the deep longings of the soul. Only one kind of happiness lasts, never wears out, namely, soul rest in God. Every other kind of pleasure becomes unsatisfying.

Happiness means wholeness; the joy of the mind alone or the body alone cannot make complete happiness. There must be the joy of the Lord to produce the perfection of enjoyment. Some are happy today and miserable tomorrow, having only one faculty supplied with pleasure. Spiritual joy thrills all other innocent delights with new power. It makes even tribulation yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness. True happiness is trusting God to care for soul, body and spirit. Then no possible calamity can disturb you. You will become so absorbed in the happiness of others that you will forget yourself, thrilled with the highest pleasure from the heart of the Eternal.

Counting mercies helps happiness; sharing the troubles of others lessens your own sorrows. Benevolent giving arouses every fine emotion of manhood. E. W. C.

Strength for Weak Hands

THURSDAY, February 7. Isa. 35 : 3. "Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees." Who are those of weak hands and feeble knees? The context here and in the Epistle to the Hebrews where these words are quoted shows that they are the Lord's servants who need encouragement. "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not." Will it not strengthen our hands to remember that we who do the Lord's work are never alone? We are not always conscious of the nearness of Christ, but he is near all the time. We need also human fellowship in our work, and we are not alone in this respect. Innumerable hearts are beating in unison with ours. Innumerable minds are studying the same problems. Myriad hands are working at the same tasks. The disciples of Jesus did not know how many friends they had until the dark days came. Their number was greater than they had known.

There is something in the nature of Christian work, in its constructive character, the thought of which should encourage us. The genuineness of an occupation is measured by the degree of pride the workman has in his finished product.

Moreover, we are a part of all we have ever done for God. In building the Church of God we build ourselves into the Church. Our lives become living stones, and hence are as immortal as the august temple of which they form a part. C. C. A.

Asking God to Lead

FRIDAY, February 8. Ps. 27 : 11. "Lead me in a plain path, because of mine enemies." The gloss in the margin of the Oxford Bible at this text suggests another rendering in conformity with the original Hebrew: "Lead me in a way of plainness because of those which observe me." This is good. The Christian is at a certain stage of his journey represented by Bunyan as having to pass between chained lions, which roar at him and make a dash for him, but cannot reach him, because of their tether. The right way led through those lions, and there was no other way. But it required wisdom and courage to go that way, and it is for such wisdom and strength that David prays when he asks God to lead him.

The Christian's path is beset on either side by enemies. He will often find himself between extremes. On the one side boldness may approach him trying to lead him into reckless conduct; on the other side craven fear may make its appearance, seeking to fill him with dread and make him very timid. At one time he may hear a suggestion that he ought to make greater use of his Christian liberty, and not be so strict with himself, but claim a few privileges: that is the suggestion of licentiousness. At another time he may be made to hear stern denunciation of the most innocent matters and the strict laying down of new moral precepts which he had not heard before, and may be led to morbid self-incrimination: that is the voice of false conscientiousness. Sometimes he may become so elated with spiritual joy that he soars above the clouds and lives among the angels, forgetting entirely that he is still in his sinful flesh and in a world that lieth in wickedness: he is extremely happy and sure that he is but a few inches from the great white throne. At another time such a deep gloom will settle upon him that it seems as if the sun had been put out and the heavens had collapsed.

These extremes may take on many different forms. To evenly pursue one's way through such conflicting opposites and intrepidly walk past them, not heeding the suggestions that come from either side, is more than man can accomplish by his own strength. Therefore the prayer of David is the prayer of every Christian. W. H. T. D.

Map of Character

SATURDAY, February 9. Ex. 34 : 35. "And Moses' face shone." The gospel of the human face reflecting soul beauty is what men like to behold. Spiritual wisdom and holiness ever make man's face to shine. Wearing such a face is to illuminate all about you, letting others see what Christ is like, that they also may glorify the Illuminator.

The soul looks out through the face to tell men of its inner life. It is said that Gladstone and Webster, in moments of exaltation, during mighty efforts of oratory, wore faces transfigured, as if the face had been an alabaster lamp lighted from within. The last night that Savonarola spent on earth before he was burned for the truth, he seemed to dream and smile. The light of heaven was already gathering on his brow. God and angels seemed near, kissing his face.

Victor Hugo, in Les Misérables, gives a lovely picture of the light on the face of the noble Bishop, as Jean Valjean, the burglar, stands at midnight ready to kill him. The good Bishop has fed the starving man and given him a room for a night's lodging, and now the criminal stands ready to strike the blow of death, in order to rob the house and flee. But the radiance on the Bishop's face, the luminous glow of peace, startles the murderer's conscience, and prevents his striking the blow. Think of the horrible hideousness of a sinful soul standing before the glory of the face of Christ at the judgment day. No wonder that they will pray for rocks and mountains to fall upon them and hide them from the face of the Holy One of God; for only the pure in heart can look upon him and live. E. W. C.

A Time for Faith and Courage

THAT the discussion as to the Church's duty and opportunity after the war should have taken so wide a range must be welcomed as a hopeful sign. While there are many views and much advice, there is through it all the universal note of longing and desire that the Church should get back to the old fundamentals, and to the exemplification of Christianity in simpler form than we see it today.

To hear the Gospel and to live it are two distinct propositions, although one is usually a stepping-stone to the other. This is very strikingly illustrated in a thoughtful and timely article in the Boston Evening Transcript, in which the writer notes the wonderful growth of a movement which he describes as a return to primitive Christianity. Begun ten years ago, it has spread until now 160 similar meetings are held throughout the United States, largely under the auspices of Christian churches. He notes in the movement many points of resemblance to the primitive Christian Church, to whose earnestness and simplicity was attributable largely the rapid spread of the new faith in those early days.

But there are many who, discussing the Church's outlook, take another view, and they do not always give a message of comfort and encouragement. Thus we hear of a Drew theological professor declaring that our faith has been "battered and hurt." From other quarters come voices of similar import, proclaiming that Christian love has waned, that Christianity is sore wounded; that the spiritual battle-line has lost its vigor and is becoming feeble, and that the Church's influence as a whole has been thrown back for many centuries. Thus, what with kindly encouragement on the one side and sharp discouragement on the other, the Church may be said to stand amid comforters who, like those of Job, do not distinguish very closely between what is helpful and what may be hurtful.

Not one of these discouraging averments is wholly true. Christianity has not been wounded to death by the war; it is as strong as ever, aye, stronger, because of the war. It is the false Christianity of the nations that has been shattered and shot to pieces—not the religion of Jesus Christ.

In the days of his earthly sojourn, the faithless priesthood, the legalistic scribes and the ceremonious Pharisees would have none of his teaching. In the eyes of those bigots and their following, he was a failure. But the failure was their own. The glorious Gospel, which they believed they had blotted out forever, has grown with every passing century. Only he who searches hearts can tell how many real Christians there are in the world today, but we know that they are a very great multitude, more than man can number, and that they will be one of the strongest spiritual factors for the world's enlightenment in the better days to come.

Yet it must be admitted that the Church should bear its share of responsibility; for had it been true to its great spiritual mission, history might have been written differently today. Sin brought war—the sin of the nations in refusing to recognize the authority of the Almighty in the world's affairs; the sin of nursing their enmities and forcing selfish antagonisms to a point where the whole structure of a false Christian civilization suddenly collapsed in blood.

But not the collapse of Christianity. Though its demise has been predicted many times, it has always disappointed its enemies by becoming stronger than ever. Each new ordeal has added to its vitality and to the number of its sincere followers. It is not in the "piping times of peace," when contentment with material conditions breeds spiritual lethargy and indifference, that the Church makes progress. It is in stress and strife, amid enforced self-denial and suffering, that it strikes its roots deeper and spreads its branches wider.

And in those better days toward which the whole world is now looking with sincere desire, let us hope that the Church may show itself possessed not only of something of the broad spiritual vision of the early Christians, but of their courage as well. Never again should it so far lower its standard as to give assent to any policy, no matter by whom enunciated, which leaves God out of the reckoning. In the clearer spiritual atmosphere which we believe will prevail, we should not fail to acknowledge his hand in the great world scheme of things, and to seek to know and to follow his will. In this desire for divine guidance the Church must take the lead. This is God's world, however the evil one may challenge his rulership.

There is a spirit moving in all the lands which, if followed, will ultimately lead the nations into peace. It matters little where or when it begins, if we are assured that it is genuine and sincere; but we believe that peace will not come until God has been heard, and until the nations are ready to bow to his authority.

Daylight-Saving

TO the simplest measures the world is sometimes indebted for the biggest results. The mere setting of the nation's clocks one hour ahead would, it is estimated by the United States Chamber of Commerce, result in the saving of 1,500,000 tons of coal a year. If this were the only result, it would in these times be momentous.

National Fuel Administrator Garfield approves of the movement, which has been put into the form of a bill before Congress. He has written to the President, asking him to urge the legislation, and stating that the indirect benefits would be even more impressive than the direct saving.

It is no untried idea, since England, France and Germany have long had it in successful operation as a war measure, and several of our own cities had adopted it even before the war, purely as an economic measure for industrial efficiency. It is asserted that it does make for efficiency as well as for saving of coal, and anything which does that should now be urged speedily. It provides that men follow the natural course of moving with the sun, and it is a pretty good guide to follow.

A New Series on Prophecy

IT will gratify very many readers of this paper to learn that another series of articles on Prophecy by Rev. James M. Gray is now ready for publication. In a letter which we have just received, he announces the topics as follows:

The English Manifesto on the Second Advent.
Christ's Future Earthly Reign.

Does the Bible Teach a General Judgment?

How the Church and the Kingdom Differ.

Some Great Prophetic Words.

Europe and the East in Prophecy.

Palestine, Israel and the Turk.

What Should be the Christian's Attitude toward Prophecy?

Dr. Gray adds that there may be still other articles, should events seem to justify them in the near future. It is beyond question that there is a very extensive interest in prophecy at the present time, and that the average thoughtful American feels the conviction that the period in which we live is one which may bring momentous revelations in the line of prophetic fulfillment. We hope that all of our readers, without exception, will study these articles by Dr. Gray and profit by their broad, deep scholarship and generous Christian spirit, and the lesson they carry to all who would know the will of God in these latter days.

Archeology and the Bible

IN a timely article in the Biblical Review, Professor Coburn of Alleghany College tells of the advances made by archeologists in recent years. Not only has the key been found to many ancient manuscripts which formerly were a riddle to the learned, but more light has been thrown upon Biblical history by archeological study and discovery than at any previous time since the finding of the "Rosetta Stone," over a century ago. The language of ancient Egypt has now been fairly mastered. It is seen that there were early periods of great literary activity in that land, comparable even to those of seven centuries later, and that in architecture, astronomy, law, and all the arts that pertain to a high state of civilization, the Nile races were ahead of their contemporaries.

Among other discoveries that connect the ancient writings with the Bible, we may mention the record of the seven years' famine in Egypt, which has now been confirmed; the ark of the Israelites is found to have had an earlier Egyptian model, and an Egyptian equivalent to the name of Moses has been deciphered. Not only have the bodies of the Pharaohs of the Oppression and the Exodus both been identified, but also, fragmentary records of their reigns. The Israelites themselves are shown to have been mentioned in a Hymn of Victory of King Merenptah, which, in celebrating a successful campaign, says: "Plundered is Pekaana (Canaan). . . . Israel is desolated. . . . Palestine has become a widow for Egypt." Reference has also been found to the Khabiri (Hebrews) invading Palestine. In the bordering lands, there have also been disclosures of great historical value. In South Arabia are traces of an ancient "Kingdom of Sheba."

Other discoveries, some of which are old and others of a comparatively recent date, Professor Coburn shows in their relation to Bible history by pointing out that they include events and personalities which have long been in dispute by critics who assailed the Scriptures as untrustworthy and legendary. Among the discoveries, as many of our readers already know, are included the Babylonian and Sumerian accounts of the Creation; early versions of the stories of the Fall and the Flood; identification of Jehu, Ahab, Benhadad, Tiglath-pileser, Belshazzar and other personalities which have been in dispute and are now shown to have been real historical characters.

In these and many other instances, archeology has given to the Scriptures the special kind of corroboration which the hostile critics long ago declared could never happen. There can be little doubt that much more is to follow. For centuries, most of the Bible lands have been in the possession of the Turks. Should these lands now remain in control of the Christian nations, we may not only look for a great forward movement among the archeologists, but for new and still more wonderful surprises.

The Prohibition Procession

FOLLOWING the example of Mississippi, Virginia has ratified the Prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and Kentucky has followed as the third in the line.

Three states ratifying within a week make a better start than could have been hoped for even by the most ardent optimists. The phenomenal rate cannot be kept up, but the initial impetus given will have tremendous effect.

The fact that the first three states to endorse Prohibition for the nation are all Southern states has its chief significance in that the South, having suffered most keenly from the liquor evil and knowing most about it, was the first to present a solid front against it.

Food Profiteering

RETAIL dealers in foodstuffs cannot any too soon realize the fact that selling prices fixed by the government must be observed. Dealers in several sections who have been overcharging are finding themselves in trouble, as prosecutions against them are being pressed with all the force of Federal power.

Every housekeeper should be alert against criminal overcharging. The most effective espionage system conceivable will be in operation when all purchasers carefully set themselves on guard against extortionate prices. The legal prices fixed by the government from time to time upon various articles are announced in the press throughout the country, and every purchaser may know that only a reasonable profit above these prices is permissible.

For example, the wholesale price of storage eggs has recently been fixed at 40 cents for Chicago and 42 cents for New York. Anything more than a reasonable profit beyond this in retailing is extortion.

It is to strictly protect the public against profiteering that the President has issued his proclamation calling for the licensing of all importers and manufacturers of and dealers in foodstuffs, feeds, tools and other necessities of life. These matters are to be held with a rigid hand, and producers and sellers alike must learn that their safety and continuance in business depend upon their compliance with the law.

The Honesty of Women

A NEW YORK woman acquires distinction by being convicted as a "get-rich-quick" swindler, the dispatches stating that she is the first woman ever convicted in the United States for that offense. This is the exception which emphasizes the generally acknowledged fact that women are seldom found wanting in the honest administration of trusts.

The number of women now employed in business and confidential positions which offer opportunities to dishonesty is very great, but it is rare that any embezzlement, defalcation or breach of trust is committed by them.

The business integrity of women in independent enterprises is acknowledged to be almost universal; but of course in this domain experience has not been so ample as in that of salaried employment.

Their honesty is perhaps to be explained largely by the absence among women of many of the temptations to which men so often lay themselves open, and also in great measure by that sensitiveness as to reputation which is more acute among women than among men. Whatever the cause, the fact is not to be disputed that occurrences of this nature are very rare among women employees who are placed in positions of trust.

Snow Saves Wheat

THE heavy snowstorm that centered over Texas and spread over the central West, the severest of the season, made the people shiver and some of the poor suffer. But it has proved a minister of mercy in protecting and saving the winter wheat crop. The snow not only protected the wheat from freezing, but also furnished it the moisture so necessary to life. Up to the time of the snowfall the government experts had reported the largest winter wheat acreage sown, with one of the poorest crop prospects in the history of the country. It is now believed that this timely snowstorm will save the crop to a magnificent yield should later conditions prove favorable. God, who made the ground and the seed, provided the rain and snow necessary for the harvest. The prophet thus uses this fact in teaching Gospel truth: "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth." (Isa. 55:10, 11)

Teacher and Cripple

WHEN fire was discovered in Public School No. 54, Manhattan, New York City, and the alarm was sounded for rapid dismissal, Miss Harriet McLoughlin, teacher in one of the upper rooms, instantly thought of a little crippled blind scholar, and debated whether she should carry the child and return for the rest, or take the children out and return for her. She did the latter, and placing the child in a chair told her to sit there and not move nor be afraid; that she would come back and get her. Then she hurriedly took the class down stairs. Then she ran back through the smoke-filled halls to her room and found the child sitting where she was placed, calmly awaiting her teacher. She took the little cripple in her arms and at the risk of her life carried her to safety. This incident marks a double heroism, that of the teacher in her physical and moral courage, and that of the child in its brave waiting and implicit faith in the teacher. The teachers in our public schools are made of that kind of stuff exactly. There is this evidence of the Christliness of the teacher's act: "Whoever shall receive one of such children in my name receiveth me." (Mark 9:37).

A Bowery Genius

COULD anything great come out of a Bowery barber shop? Certainly; one of the greatest musical prodigies in the world, in the person of Max Rosen, who though only eighteen years of age has won fame as a violinist. About seventeen years ago a Rumanian, Benjamin Rosen, emigrated to New York and started a little barber shop on the Bowery. Max was the baby, nine months old. The father played on an old violin, which he had brought from the old country, to the baby before he could walk, and the child was entranced with its strains. When the boy got old enough to handle a bow the father got a tiny fiddle for him. He used it to such advantage that they sent him to an East Side settlement musical school for instruction. There musical critics recognized his talent, and brought it to the attention of a rich man, who put up the money and sent the lad of eleven years to Europe to be a pupil of Professor Leopold Auer of Dresden, who taught Elman, Zimbalist and Helfitz. The young artist was made by the feels a sneeze coming, it must be suppressed in some manner. Recently, Miss Angelina Marley felt that she had to sneeze, and to prevent making the noise and breaking the rule caught her nose between her thumb and finger. With the repressed sneeze she lost her the child to overemphasize the non-essentials to character and conduct. In the attempt to have silence in the schoolroom, blindness is brought to a child. Christ thus condemns the overemphasis of minor details as compared with essentials: "For ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith." (Matt. 23:23.)

Trees That Bear Soap

BESIDES the trees that bear fruits there are those which produce gums for medicinal and industrial purposes, such as rubber. There are some that produce nuts for food. There are some trees whose sap is sugar. The latest thing in the tree line in this country is one whose nuts yield soap. It is a native of China. Bars of laundry soap do not grow on the branches, but if the hull be shredded and used with water it will produce a perfect lather which some authorities state has a cleansing quality superior to many of the manufactured soaps. The extract's efficiency as a foam-producer makes it useful as an ingredient in carbonated beverages; the kernel yields an oil that can be used for cooking and as a substitute for olive oil. There is this reference to the use of soap in the olden times: "For he is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap." (Mal. 3:2.)

Rice 1,000 Years Old

RICE grown from seed grains one thousand years old was served the Emperor of Japan when he attended the maneuvers of the Japanese army recently in Shiga prefecture. The ancient rice grains were found inside a wooden image in a little Buddhist temple in the village of Iwame. The image was that of the god of wealth, and had become so old as to need repairing. In doing this there was found a flaxen bag containing the seed and a paper with the following instructions in ancient Chinese characters: "This image has been carved for the peace of the world. If any one of a later generation opens it he should put in new seed." The seeds were planted and yielded a good crop, and the Mikado, whose family has ruled Japan for 2,400 years, in his official functions ate rice from seed 1,000 years old. We see here an illustration of the reproductive power of life in the vegetable and animal world, and of the law that like comes from like, wheat from wheat, and rice from rice. This great fact is a type of the reproductive power of human thought and action, and of the immensely important truth that right thoughts, sentiments, and deeds come from good seed, and wrong thoughts, affections, and actions from bad seed. The rice confined for a thousand years on being released started in at the first opportunity to make more rice. The thoughts released from the brain start in at once to make more just like them, which grow into deeds, which crystallize into character, which has in it the reproductive power of heaven or hell. The apostle thus expresses this truth, than which none can be more important: "For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." (Gal. 6:7-8.)

United States Ambassador Morris and Mr. Hardy

Mikado Receives American Sailor

FOR the first time in the history of Japan a private citizen without diplomatic rank or mission was received by the Emperor. The person thus honored was William B. Hardy. This veteran hero was received at the American Legation by Rowland S. Morris, the new ambassador to Japan, and escorted by him to the imperial chrysanthemum garden party and formally presented to the Japanese Emperor. In a private letter just received from Rev. E. T. Iglehart, a missionary in Tokyo, there is this reference to the reception: "Captain Hardy is one of the most unique visitors Japan ever had. Sixty-four years ago he rowed bow-oar in Commodore Perry's barge as he came to knock at the doors of medieval Japan. He is said to be the last survivor of the great expedition. He is back now for the first time in sixty-four years. The Emperor received him the other day and violated or rather created a precedent by shaking hands with him and speaking to him in English. He preached to our crowded chapel last Sunday. He is a fine old rugged historic Christian specimen." Why should not the Emperor receive an humble, manly man like Hardy, intrinsically as good as any king? Besides, he is a loyal, royal American sailor, with his work done, his battles fought, awaiting his coronation.

He is more than that; he is one of the heroes who were permitted to take an active part in one of the most important events in the history of the world, the awakening of Japan. Commodore Perry was not more necessary to the expedition than were the true, brave men like Hardy who accompanied him. The presence of those warships in the harbor of Uraga in 1853 so frightened the Japanese that Commodore Perry was enabled to force a treaty from the Shogun which opened the doors of seclusion to the commerce and civilization of the world. These ships awoke the nation which had enjoyed its peace and seclusion for over 200 years, after the expulsion of the Portuguese in 1624, into a new life and glory. Japan now has a constitution and a parliament and is learning the art, science, education and commerce of the West. She has guaranteed religious freedom under which Christian missions are prospering marvelously. The sailors and soldiers of America today, worthy successors of Hardy, are on the sea and land defending Old Glory, and are fighting for the cause of humanity, of democracy and Christianity. Perry's ships waking up Japan were but the echo of this voice of God: "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." (Eph. 5:14.)

musical talent inherited from his father, by the most competent technical teaching, and by tireless industry in practice. The opportunities of our American democracy and the aristocracy of talent took the little Jew from the Bowery barber shop and carried him into the company of the highest artists who charm and bless their fellow men. There is this reference to the viol as a musical instrument among the Jews: "That chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music, like David." (Amos 6:5.)

Sneeze Causes Blindness

ONE of the rules of the local high school at Columbia, Pa., is that pupils are forbidden to sneeze in the room during the session. When a pupil sight and, according to reports, lost it forever. Whether the optic nerve was injured beyond repair, as is claimed, or not, the fact remains that the rule is a ridiculous one and never should have been made. If the earthly light of that dear girl shall have been put out forever, a thousand years of schoolroom silence could not atone for it. To sneeze is as necessary at times as to breathe, and no schoolmaster has a right to make a rule to prevent it. Rules covering essentials in school should be strong and regularly enforced. When it comes to non-essentials, fewer rules will be necessary, and it should be carefully seen to that they are wise. Some denominations lay down arbitrary rules for the suppression of the natural and innocent impulses of childhood, including even the sneeze. It hurts rather than helps

To Win the Soul of the Orient

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

MAJOR GENERAL HIBIKI, acting head of the two hundred thousand Christians of Japan, bowed deeply. His secretary, an attaché in uniform, and his personal attendant also bowed. So, perforce, I bowed, too.

"S'il vous plait!" said the General politely, indicating a chair. It was his only sentence during our interview that I understood. Gratefully I sank into the chair indicated.

We were in the parlor of the Hotel Latham, the five of us. The Hotel Latham is a quiet place, just off Fifth Avenue on Twenty-eighth Street, and the General in his khaki-colored uniform, with its touches of scarlet on shoulder and wrist, seemed like some romance-figure set down into the quiet of it. The chintz-covered furniture did not fit the General. One, seeing his keen face and his small commanding figure and the gray mustaches that somehow added to his dignity, felt that teak-wood and black lacquer would have been a more fitting background.

I have never before interviewed an ultra-important Oriental. But I have heard that your Easterner expects something formal in the way of a salutation. So I spoke:

"The Christian Herald," I said to the General, "sends to you a greeting from its staff and from its many readers. They honor you for the great work that you have done and are doing. And they wonder whether you have any message that you would care to give to the people of America."

THE General fixed me with his keen gaze. Quite suddenly he shot at me a volume of speech in a tongue I could not understand.

The interpreter, a tall man with particularly white teeth, translated softly. "The General, he says," the interpreter told me, "that the people of the United States need no greeting from our land! For a half century they have sent their money, their missionaries, and their friendship to us. Surely they know that Japan—appreciates!"

The General spoke again. One of his hands—small like all Japanese hands but with a look of power and strength despite its size—beat upon the other. The interpreter again delivered the message.

"The General fears," he said, "that the American people think Japan too far advanced to need help and missionaries! But the General says that it is not so. We still need money, help, encouragement! Japan has advanced, yes, outwardly; but the General says that the Japanese nation needs help from—inside!" And the interpreter patted his chest, eloquently, in the region of his heart.

"I had thought," I replied to the interpreter, "that, as you say, Japan was too progressive to need assistance. I had thought—"

The General interrupted. I noticed, oddly enough, that he talked, not to the interpreter, but directly to me. He talked vehemently, with gesticulating hands and eloquent eyes.

"The General says," murmured the interpreter, "that Japan needs much help—particularly in her capital, Tokyo. When Tokyo is a Christian city, Japan will be a Christian nation. When Japan is a Christian nation, the Orient will have been saved!"

The General interrupted again. There was a softer look in his eyes—a more visionary look—as he spoke. The interpreter was smiling as he translated.

"It is the General's dream," he told me, "to see a new, united Japan—a Japan made Christian and worshipping at one great undenominational church, one church where all creeds meet as equals through the love of God!"

THE attaché stepped to the General's side and whispered something. There was a lull in the conversation as the General answered him, and during that lull I put a direct question, in an aside, to the attaché.

"Will the General," I questioned, "tell me what he feels about the new friendship with Japan? There has always been a fellowship between your country and ours, but lately it has broadened into something more noble and worth while."

The attaché retired to the other side of the room and the interpreter put my question to the General. And, for the first time, I saw a real smile break over the General's face—a smile that shone from his eyes and twitched at his mustache—as he answered. His answer was a long, enthusiastic one.

"THE General knows," said the interpreter, "that there has been talk of a break in the friendship that lies between our two lands. He knows that there has been suspicion and unrest. But the General does not fear any break in this friendship! For, as Japan becomes a Christian nation, the friendship between it and the United States will become stronger—firmer. Japan is an Oriental land. It is of a different type of country from yours. It is like the center of a great wheel. India, China, Korea, the rest—they are the spokes of the wheel. But Japan is the center!"

"America, too, is the center of a wheel that revolves in her part of the world. And so what could be more right and fitting than that these two nations should have a friendship existing between them that grows stronger every day—a friendship that, every day, is a new friendship! With Japan following the lead of the United States and becoming completely Christianized, there is no reason why these two greatest countries of the East and the West should not work for each other and together, toward a common good!"

There was another lull in the conversation. I glanced covertly at the General's wrist watch and saw that the time was flying. But I had one more question to ask. I put it rather diffidently.

"I wonder if the General will say anything," I queried, "about the war—"

The General's voice was lower, graver, as he answered. And the interpreter's voice was also grave as he told me the answer.

"The General," he told me, "is not here on a diplomatic mission. So he can not say much. But he wants the Christian Herald to know that Japan feels deeply and appreciatively the help that the United States is giving in Europe. Japan feels that every one of your soldiers and sailors is fighting not only the fight of America, but of Japan.

"It was in 1906 that you of the Christian Herald helped the people of our land. It was during a great famine, when the crops were swept away and many were dying of starvation. You sent over half a million dollars.

"The world is in a like situation now. If America had not helped the world, as the Christian Herald helped us in 1906, there would have been another famine—a world famine of truth!"

Of course the General did not speak of it, but it may not be out of place to tell it here: The General brought to this country a gift of $10,000 to aid the Y. M. C. A. Of this amount $5,000 was the personal contribution of the Emperor and Empress on Christmas Eve, as an appreciation of the work of the Y. M. C. A. in the Japanese army during the Russo-Japanese War.

The little General rose to his feet. His face was aglow. He spoke rapidly, and directly, toward me. I felt that he had forgotten that I was an alien—that I did not understand his tongue. I felt that he thought of me only as one of an allied people. The interpreter spoke after him, softly. "Now that we have a common foe, and are working toward a common belief, who can say that we are not friends?" he questioned.

THE little General remained standing, and I, too, rose to my feet. So did the personal attendant and the interpreter and the attaché from across the room. The interview was plainly at an end. I bowed, and the four bowed with me.

"Will you tell the General," I said to the interpreter, "that the Christian Herald thanks him for his message. Will you tell him that our readers will watch his country's great progress with much interest and respect?"

"And the General tells you," the interpreter said, "that he wishes the readers of the Christian Herald to know that, despite the fact that he is of the East and they are of the West—despite the difference in race and civilization and color—that he feels toward them the brotherhood of man."

side it. As soon as one died she was dragged to the trench. The gendarmes said they could not take care of the babies who were left behind by the dying mothers, so many of them were thrown into the trench and buried alive."

GERMANY'S motives in permitting these slaughters, which have cleared the Turk's dominions of more than a million defenseless Christian souls, was revealed to the Rev. Alpheus Newell Andrus, senior missionary for the American Board at Mardin, Mesopotamia. From Turkish men of affairs, men of knowledge and position, he learned the reason for this national tragedy.

"The Germans, looking ahead to the time when they hoped to obtain complete dominion in Turkey, wanted to have the country free of the Armenian question to save themselves trouble," Dr. Andrus said. "The Armenian question is partly religious and partly political. It was this unsettled religious and political situation in Turkey that the Germans wanted to get rid of. So they suggested the removal of the Armenian race root and branch from the Turkish Empire. At Urfa the Armenians made a stand and barricaded themselves in their stone houses and withstood the efforts of the inefficient Moslem soldiery for ten days. Then German officers brought up German cannon and mowed them down."

Into the rugged mountains of the Caucasus 300,000 Armenians fled from TWELVE hundred men, a hundred or more at a time, were led out in the depth of night and slaughtered with axes; 2,500 others were dumped from rafts into the Tigris River and drowned; great companies of women and children were driven over burning deserts until they fell famished and died, or were herded into ravines and mowed down with bullets; and babies were thrown alive into burial trenches with the bodies of their murdered mothers—in these terms the story of Armenian and Syrian massacres by the Turks has been brought out firsthand by five Christian missionaries, who each passed through a different phase of those hideous events.

They reveal, also, how and why a supposedly Christian nation struck hands with the Turk, suggesting that he clear his dominions of the Christian Armenians and Syrians; how it first proposed these things to the Ottoman government; and then, when here and there victims of the "deportations," as the massacres were euphemistically called, made a desperate stand against their Moslem persecutors, how it was the officers and cannon of that same so-called Christian nation that were used to crush them.

The five men who told me the story have spent the best years of their lives in the work of Christian humanity in the Turkish Empire—gentle-spirited men, who spoke without rancor, even against the Turk, albeit their best friends and the associations that had become inseparably the dearest part of their lives were swept away in these holocausts of cruelty.

What Five Missionaries Saw

By GURDEN EDWARDS

They have seen more of horror than the normal human mind could even imagine; nevertheless they have enough of Christ in their hearts to believe that the Turk can yet be made human. When it is all over, when Teuton and Ottoman have ceased waging slaughter against the defenseless, they intend to go back to do what they can to bind up the wounds of the mutilated nations, perhaps at the risk of their own lives for telling the world about the Turk and his work.

THE Rev. George E. White, president of Anatolia College, Marsovan, northern Asia Minor, saw plainly the hand of Germany in these things. He saw Turkey begin mobilizing for the war in April, 1914, several months before the assassination of the Austrian Crown Prince, which started the world-conflagration.

"They mobilized under German lead, ership," he said. "The Turks knew way back then that war was imminent. The Turkish general who came to take charge at Marsovan received his military education at Berlin. In April he circulated placards that were sealed; they were not opened and posted until August. When opened they were found to proclaim that a state of war had begun!"

Then followed, a few months later, the slaughter of the Armenians at Marsovan—the massacre of the men at night by Turk peasants with axes, and the sweeping away of 10,000 women and children in "deportations"—driven over the deserts until they died of thirst. "One group of our college boys asked permission to sing before they died," said Dr. White. "They sang 'Nearer, My God, to Thee.' Then they were struck down."

How the men of Harpoot, driven and beaten by Moslem gendarmes, were tied with ropes in groups and taken out to slaughter, was described by the Rev. Henry H. Riggs, missionary there of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

"Out of the first party of 800, one youth survived to tell what happened," he said. "He told me that they were driven into a deep ravine. Then the gendarmes climbed on rocks and fired bullets into the mass as long as any showed signs of life. My friend succeeded in getting his knife from his pocket and cutting the ropes that bound him. He made a dash for liberty, and only a miracle saved him unscathed from the volley of bullets that followed him."

"The women and children were driven over the desert. Near Harpoot was a place where they camped on the journey to their death. There was a trench be-

THE blazing sign of a cinema theater flashed its luring call next door to the church.

Instead of being itself a beckoning light to the Sunday evening crowds who filled the street, the church was shadowed by the electric flare of the motion picture theater. The minister saw the young folks of his parish crossing the cinema threshold, and his evening services were held with empty pews.

What, he queried, could be done about it?

Instead of trying to tear down the influence of the motion pictures which seemed so potent in the life of his neighborhood, the minister decided upon a constructive method of attack. He went to one of the large film exchanges and spent a half-day in a business consultation with the manager.

The result of this conference was an unexpected announcement in the church calendar for the following week:

Motion pictures will form a regular part of the evening services, beginning Sunday evening. A motion picture machine has been purchased and is being installed in the church. Special wires in conduits, a special transformer and a steel fire-proof booth are part of the equipment. A curtain will be suspended in front of the organ. Special addresses will be a feature of the service illustrated by the pictures.

The next Sunday evening the church was crowded. Old parishioners expecting to be shocked, young men and women from the careless crowds of the street wishing to be entertained, Sunday loafers hoping for a chance to scoff, were there. They all sat in hushed, reverent interest at what they saw upon the screen.

They saw Samson, the giant man of the Hebrews, live and play his part in Biblical history before their eyes. He bore the gates of the great city upon his back and slew his enemies with the jawbone of an ass. He appeared on the screen; blind and dishonored, and at last brought the walls of the temple down upon the heads of an impious congregation. It seemed to all that a story of something very misty and far away was really a vital part of the city's life in which they lived. No one was shocked; motion picture enthusiasts were held with a new interest; there was nothing at which to scoff.

While his audience was still held under the spell of the pictures, the minister spoke briefly about giant strength of today, in individuals, in great businesses, in morals, and the best use of such strength. The church choir gave selections from Handel's oratorio of Samson, including Samson's world-famed lament.

The congregation passed silently into the street at the end of the service and home. The sign of the motion picture theater had lost its charm for them. Sunday night offered them something even more thrilling than "The Train Robber's Bride."

CONSTRUCTIVE methods in dealing with society and its various problems are always more successful than those of destruction. When a movement like that of the motion picture attracts eight million people in America in a day, it is the part of wisdom to try to turn it to good purpose. The fight is won if the church is able to open its own doors to the motion picture producer in such a way that this huge industry may operate for the spiritual good of the congregations.

A good many churches and church organizations are joining hands with the "movies," either through using motion pictures within their own walls in illustration of their work and thought, or by so influencing a good exhibitor in their neighborhood that he will show religious pictures on certain days to an interested audience. The latter is the simpler plan for the parish in a small town.

Bringing Motion Pictures Into the Church

By CAROLYN SHERWIN BAILEY

Sunday schools have begun using motion pictures in Bible instruction. Societies of young people find great help in their missionary study and discussion of social problems in the travel and sociologic films that are being prepared by some of the best manufacturers today. The attendance at settlement and mission houses is stimulated by the best screen pictures. A large church in New Jersey, several in New York City and in the West, have used motion pictures in connection with their regular services for some time, and in each instance there has been increased attendance with no loss, and a gain, rather, in interest in the specific problems of the church.

Already there is a large amount of good material in motion pictures from which the church may recruit.

Not long ago a company went to Palestine to take pictures to illustrate the life of Christ. The results of this picture pilgrimage were so unusual that the film was adopted by the Orthodox Greek Church of Rumania and its premiere was attended by the king and queen, the ministers and the school children, the latter being given a holiday to see the picture.

IN addition to films that are available, portraying New Testament subjects, the lives of Samson, David, Moses and Joseph, the church has a good deal of secular material in motion pictures to draw upon, all of which bears upon its teachings and its interests. Today's reawakening of the sociologic conscience of the community has stimulated the making of motion pictures that attack intemperance, the drug evil, gambling and the various crimes of society. There are films that show the dangers of contagion, the cure of tuberculosis, the lowering of the infant death-rate, the lessening of the child labor horror and the work of social relief agencies all over the country. Classics of literature with ethical bearing, such as Quo Vadis, Les Misérables, David Copperfield, Oliver Twist, Vanity Fair, The Last Days of Pompeii, and other books, have been filmed in a very realistic way. Prison evils, great industries and manufacturing plants, the customs of strange peoples, and even the Commandments, have been made the basis of motion pictures of spiritual as well as secular interest.

Because any kind of connection between the church and the cinema is so new, there is the problem of just how to work out the details of the collaboration. The large, prosperous parish may install its equipment for from two to three hundred dollars. The smaller parish may avail itself of a used projector for much less than this. The isolated church may form its congregation into a league for better "movies," pledged to attend the local theater on special days when films suggested by the church are shown, and so influence the character and tone of the town's entertainments.

MOTION pictures are possible for even the most struggling church. A little church in Louisiana has motion pictures twice a week, on Wednesday and Saturday. There is a small fee for admission charged, and the amount netted each week, usually thirty-five dollars, pays for the pictures as well as those which are shown on Sunday in illustration of the evening address.

Even the training of the layman in operating is being attempted. The minister of an Illinois church who exhibits motion pictures Sunday evenings to a congregation that is sometimes as large as one thousand recently gave instruction at a convention regarding the proper use and care of a motion picture machine. Many parishes are unable to use the machine because of lack of skilled help in the art of projection. A new kind of parish work for the layman would be such training and the raising of the necessary money for the motion picture machine.

The moving picture is here to stay and it has brought about a new situation in every community. Thousands of young people, longing for companionship, entertainment and thrills, attend the motion picture theaters, and all through the day's work and everywhere they meet the latest film is the subject of their conversation. In some towns the saloon is beginning to feel a distinct loss because of a nearby motion picture theater. Many public halls are being used for motion pictures now instead of dancing.

Two potent facts in connection with the cinema are its colossal backing and its influence upon the public for better or worse. The church will find in cooperation not only an opportunity but a duty.

What minister would not welcome such a Sunday evening crowd as this?

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

AND then Inez suddenly burst out, clutching Miss Burton's hand so hard that it hurt.

"Miss Burton, I don't care. I've got to tell someone. I can't always live this way all to myself. And I believe you will know how I— I don't care to go away now— I—the church—it's all—I'm in love with Mr. Chase, and I know it's no use. And I'm awfully wretched and unhappy and at the same time I'm happy. I never felt so before. The very sight of him makes me tremble all over as if I couldn't stand, and I—I—I'd marry him tonight if—if he'd ask me, and go anywhere or do anything he'd ask me. I don't feel wicked when I see or hear him. He's heavens above me, and I know it's no use, but I do love him. He's different. Different from all the stupid men in Red Hill. He's like the people in—in stories. He does the things they do. He can't help it. He's born to do them. And I'm in love with him. Oh, Miss Burton—I know it's no use. Help me to get away somewhere. I'm so wretched. But I'm happy too. What will become of me? What was I born for, anyhow?"

Poor Inez in a torrent of self-revelation had blown up the floodgates and let the long-imprisoned waters out. And the girl's confession swept down over Agnes Burton like a cloudburst. She had gasped as if suddenly immersed in ice water, but when Inez finally ceased she was saying to her calmly enough:

"How could such a thing come to you so suddenly?"

"I don't know, Miss Burton, unless I was all ready for it."

"But he hasn't been here two weeks. He—"

"It doesn't seem to make any difference. Seems as if I'd known him all my life. And I know it's useless. I'm not his sort. But— Oh, you don't think it's very wicked in me to love him, do you—do you, Miss Burton?"

Inez flung herself out of her chair at Miss Burton's feet and laid her head on her lap. Agnes Burton folded the sobbing girl's head in her arms. After a while she said, as if talking to a child:

"Dear, it's not wicked to love—it's the most beautiful thing in the world—but—but—I don't see—how—you—"

THERE was silence, only Inez's body shook with her low sobbing. Then she said, talking in muffled voice as she knelt there: "I ought to go away. A girl like me doesn't belong in a little country town. I belong in a big city. In my dreams I am always walking the streets of big cities. And—and—I'm afraid if I stay here—I'll—I'll get Mr. Chase into trouble—"

"No! No!" Agnes Burton started up so suddenly that Inez was thrown back. "You don't mean—"

"Miss Burton, I don't know what I mean. I'm so unhappy, so wretched. I can't bear it to live this life. It's all so unreal to me—so stupid—or it was until—he came—"

"You poor child!" Agnes Burton sank back in her chair, and again her hands fell gently and caressingly on Inez's head.

After a while Inez said more calmly, lifting a lovely but tear-stained face to her teacher, "What do you think I ought to do?"

"I don't know. Let me think."

"What would you do in my place?"

"I don't know. It's not an easy thing to do. Only—let me ask you one question. Mr. Chase, of course, does not know anything about all this."

"I'm afraid he does."

"You haven't—"

"He knows," said Inez speaking so slowly and positively that Miss Burton let her hands fall from the girl's head and she drew back in her chair a little.

Inez, falling back on her knees, crouching there on the porch floor, spoke in a low steady voice that made Miss Burton shiver.

"I haven't been able to conceal it. He is not a fool. But his soul is as pure as an angel's. I ought not to be talking about him even to you. But all through the years I have been living here with myself all alone. And tonight it seemed to me I could endure it no longer. My father cares for me all right, but he thinks more of his invention than of me. And other people don't interest me. Miss Burton, won't you help me to go away? If you don't, I'll run away. I want excitement. I can't live here now after—"

Her voice trailed away into the quiet that now brooded over the night. The breeze had died down. Not even a small leaf on the vine quivered. Miss Burton got up slowly. Inez got to her feet.

"I'll have to go home, Inez, I'm sorry. You can't understand."

"Oh, you don't think there's any chance for me, do you?" Inez broke out, gripping Agnes Burton's arm so hard it left a mark.

"No, no—I don't. He— Mr. Chase is—"

"He's different, I know. But I'm not sorry I love him. It doesn't make me any worse."

She said it defiantly, and turned slowly and went into the house.

WHEN Howard came into the parsonage that evening his sister was working at something out in the kitchen. As she heard him enter she came into the sitting-room.

As she came closer to him she threw up her hands and exclaimed, "Howard Chase! What's the matter with you? What have you been doing? Where have you been?"

Howard replied with one of his well-known grins.

"I've been to the show. Don't I look as if I had?"

"You surely do. Why, mercy! Your eyebrows are all burned off!"

"No. Are they?" he said soberly.

He walked into his little bedroom which was off the sitting-room, turned on the light, and stared into his looking-glass. Then he turned to Rose, who had followed him into the room.

"Looks pretty bad, doesn't it? But I believe they'll grow out again."

He rubbed his fingers over the burnt places and grinned again.

Rose laughed, but instantly stopped. "You can't preach like that, next Sunday."

"Why not? What have eyebrows to do with preaching?"

"I never saw the use of eyebrows before," said Rose. "But they look quite important when they're gone. You wouldn't go into the pulpit looking like that, would you?"

"I'm going, just the same. It will punish me for my pride over my good looks." He grinned again.

"Pride! I never knew a man with so little. You haven't any vanity."

"Plenty of it, sister. If you really only knew how discomfited I feel over my looks right this minute you would spend the rest of the night praying that I might be converted."

"Don't be foolish. Tell me, you silly boy, what happened. All about it."

HE gave her the story of the evening, dwelling lightly on his own act, but emphasizing the incidents of the film and Inez and Miss Burton.

"I don't believe you've told me the best part of it. But I'll get it from Agnes. And your face is burned too. Why don't you tell me all about it? You'll have blisters there."

She rose and went into her room and brought out some ointment and rubbed it over his face, scolding him meanwhile as he laughed at her.

"I'll apply for a Carnegie medal for you."

"And hang it over my eyebrows. Or rather over the place where they were. Good idea. But I tell you, Rose, it was all worth while. I need a little excitement to keep me going. And when Seymour gets up I'm going to see if we can't manage to reform this film business. Pictures like the one tonight are simply a travesty on life. Miss Burton is right when she says they are demoralizing to girls like Inez Clark. Do you know, that girl is a city type. The first time I saw her I couldn't help thinking of a picture I saw in a film magazine. Why, she is just the sort that runs away and has romantic thrills over silly stories as if they were real."

"And sometimes," said Rose with more shrewdness than her brother always gave her credit for, "sometimes such girls have romantic thrills over actual people."

"I suppose they do." He said it gravely, and then turned the talk to his plans for the coming Sunday.

"I think Brother Noyes will accept our invitation to take the evening service, or at least share it with us. We vote on it at our meeting tomorrow evening. If Brother Allen doesn't have a change of heart our people will invite the Methodists to come over."

"You really plan to appear next Sunday looking like that?"

"How else can I look? Perhaps I can live it down," he said with a grin. But he got up, went into his room and looked at himself in the glass again.

When he came out he was looking so grave that Rose exclaimed:

"You see, Howard? It won't do. Really it won't. Get Brother Noyes to take your services. Let him preach for you morning and evening."

"No, I can't do that, Rose. Why, I've got a sermon in my system out of tonight's experience that I must get out or I'll blow up. Besides, I don't want to risk Brother Noyes's theology on my congregation. And I do need some punishment for my vanity. You don't know me. Sister, I am going to preach Sunday morning, eyebrows or no eyebrows."

SHE knew him well enough not to protest or argue, but when the morning came and Howard had a daylight view of himself the effect of it was so startling that he almost regretted his statement made to his sister, and was half minded to take her advice and go and ask Brother Noyes to take both his services.

But when he ventured about noon to go out on the street to the postoffice he found that he was the talk of the town.

The Expressman had backed his wagon up against the platform waiting for Number Ten. The Agent had just pulled the semaphore down for clear and was sitting at his open window near the edge of the platform.

"That was a great stunt, Mr. Chase got off last night, eh?" said the Agent as the Expressman looked in the window.

"Well, I should say. He was the hull show and then some. They say he yanked Jake Seymour clear out of his little booth in the cozy and threw him clean across the street into Sam Green's drug store."

"And he landed right under the sody fountain so all they had to do when he opened his mouth and moaned for water was to turn the faucet," said the Agent as he got up to sell a ticket.

When he came back the Expressman was saying, "I hear his mustache and eyebrows was burnt clean off by the explosion, and he may lose his eyesight. I hope it ain't so. I'd hate to have anything like that happen to Mr. Chase."

"He must ha' given you a dollar for takin' his trunk up to the parsonage," said the Agent, grinning. "But that can't be true about the mustache, for Mr. Chase didn't have any."

"Come to think, you're right about that," said the Expressman meditatively. "But he had eyebrows. Everybody has them."

"This is the most gossip town in Kansas," said the Agent, as he rose to sell another ticket.

WHEN he came back to his seat by the window the Expressman said thoughtfully, "The men seem to be as bad as the women in Red Hill for gossip."

"Worse," said the Agent opening his key for Lawton to ask for Number Ten.

"Yes. I dunno but you're right. I always said if anybody went wrong in Red Hill some man would tell it first. But I feel kinda worried about Mr. Chase. I'd hate to see anything happen—"

"He can take care of himself," said the Agent interrupting.

"Yes, but can he take care of other folks? That's the question."

When Howard opened his mail that Number Ten brought from the west he was delighted to find a letter from his seminary classmate, Roy Lennox. He came out of his study into the kitchen to read it to his sister.

"He and Kate will be here next week. He writes—'Get your best room ready for next Friday. We shall arrive on Number Ten. Don't forget the three-story apple pies you promised me. Is there any prospect of the assistant pastorate we talked about? Affectionately, ROY AND KATE.'"

"We'll have a great time. I've missed the old fellow dreadfully. There's a number of things I want to talk over with him."

Howard went back to his work with a glow of anticipation as he thought over his chum's arrival.

That evening at the church prayer meeting the question of inviting the Methodists to use the building part of the time on Sunday was stated by Howard with great frankness, and to his pleasant surprise with almost no discussion the people voted unanimously to invite the Methodists to join in their services while they were without a house of worship.

Howard went right over the next morning to see Brother Noyes.

Noyes was grateful and expressed himself fittingly. He also agreed with Howard that they invite a general community meeting of all the churches to attend the evening services during the summer.

"Our yard is the largest and best," said Howard. "I'll get busy and put up the platform, get out the dodgers, and you do the preaching next Sunday. The rest of us will pray or sing or take up the collection or whatever you say."

"All right." Noyes laughed at Chase's enthusiasm. But he had yet to learn that when Howard once did a thing even against his own personal wishes and ambition he threw all regret to the wind.

"How about the collection?" Brother Noyes said.

"We'll divide it up equally," Howard replied promptly.

"Only taking out your part for expenses in lighting, and so forth," said Noyes.

"Agreed." Howard was pleasantly surprised. "Suppose we outline the dodgers now."

They drafted a copy and Howard after a few changes got up to go, saying, "We ought to have a great crowd."

"I'm sure we would if you were going to preach," said Noyes with a laugh. "We will anyhow. You see. The only trouble will be to get seats enough."

"I believe we can furnish some chairs out of our wreck. And by the way, Brother Chase, I believe some of the lumber from your platform blew into our yard. At any rate, go and help yourself to any lumber there you can use. It will save buying."

"I'll do it," Howard said promptly, as he went out.

ALL that afternoon he worked with the help of a volunteer committee of men representing both churches, putting up the platform, stringing his wires and getting lumber and seats from the ruin in the Methodist churchyard.

But first he went directly from Brother Noyes over to Clark's with his copy for the dodger.

Inez's father was in the back of the room and she was sitting on her high seat at the case.

He went directly up to the case and began at once to tell Inez how he wanted the dodgers printed. He had, in the excitement of his planning, forgotten all about his own looks. But Inez exclaimed, "You did get hurt, Mr. Chase, last night!"

"Only in my feelings. Lost some of my good looks, that's all." He laughed, and Inez joined feebly. But Howard rather sharply came back to the dodgers.

"It's a hurry job, I know, Miss Clark. But I want them not later than tomorrow morning. Here it is Friday. Can you do them for me?"

"Yes, I guess so," Inez looked over the copy. "I can get the proof for you tonight. Shall I bring it over to you? Or will you correct it here?"

"If you could bring it over—" Howard spoke carelessly. "I shall be very busy this afternoon and evening."

"I'll be at the parsonage by eight or nine," Inez said. Howard thanked her, took off his hat, bowed gravely and went out in his abrupt fashion. Just as he turned he almost collided with Mrs. Wilson, who had just come in. The door had been standing open.

He said good morning to her. She returned his greeting and asked Inez for a copy of the paper.

"It's not ready yet, Mrs. Wilson." "But you go to press this morning, don't you?" said Mrs. Wilson, sharply. "I want to see that advertisement I sent in of my lost handbag."

"We are behind on the paper this week," Inez replied. "The storm spoiled some of our paper. We had to send to Lawton for a supply."

MRS. WILSON looked at Inez with a look of suspicion and disapproval. Then she went to the door and gazed at Howard's retreating form. Then she turned and looked again at Inez, who had left her case and was beginning on the dodger. After a moment she shook her head slowly and went away. Inez did not look at her. But as she went on with her work a red spot burned feverishly on her cheeks.

Howard worked all the afternoon like four men, and got up his wires and platform and filled the yard with all the pews he could pull out of the Methodist church wreckage.

After supper he went into his little study and began to work on his Sunday morning sermon.

He had been sitting there only a few minutes when Rose came in.

"I may go out a little while over to the church to rehearse with Agnes."

"Oh, all right. If any one calls before you go, don't disturb me unless it's very important. I've got to shut myself in here all night. Oh, I forgot. Miss Clark is coming over with the proof of the Sunday night dodger. I must see that."

Rose stopped in the doorway. "Coming over with the proof?"

"Yes," replied her brother. He was already in one of his absent-minded moods his sister knew so well.

She looked at him gravely, and went into the sitting-room, put on her hat, and went out of the house.

Fifteen minutes later she returned. If Howard had not been so deeply buried in his own thought he would have detected two women's voices as Rose came back into the sitting-room. The little clock on his desk said seven-thirty.

Up the street on her porch, half a block from the parsonage, sat Mrs. Wilson, watching the street. A light on the corner illuminated a part of the parsonage and church.

The woman on the porch leaned forward eagerly and her eye gleamed.

A girl was going up the walk. She turned in at the parsonage gate and went up the steps.

It was Inez. Mrs. Wilson watched her as she went up to the door. She was there at the door only a moment. It opened and she went in. The woman on the porch sat back with a sigh of satisfaction.

CHAPTER V

THE minute Inez entered the parsonage and shut the door she found herself face to face with Rose. And as she took a step into the room she confronted Miss Burton, who was seated at the piano.

Rose said quietly, "You have come with the proof of the dodger. If you will give it me I will take it to my brother."

Inez without a word handed the proof over and Rose took it and went into Howard's study, closing the door.

Inez remained standing in the middle of the room, looking at Miss Burton. They could hear the low sound of voices in the other room.

"Did you have to come here, Inez?"

"Yes, I did. How about you?"

"I came because Miss Chase invited me," said Miss Burton, coloring a little.

"And I came because Mr. Chase invited me," said Inez a little defiantly.

"Invited you?"

"I brought over the proof he wanted. Is there anything wrong about that?"

"No, perhaps not. But after what you told me—"

Inez came over and sat down by Miss Burton. She seemed greatly disturbed as she spoke hurriedly.

"I told you I was afraid I would get him into trouble. But I wouldn't do it for the world. I think too much of him."

"Hush!" said Miss Burton, and she added almost sternly: "Inez, we can't talk here, but you must remember what a gossip town Red Hill is—"

Inez was listening, her face pale, her lips trembling, her eyes on the door into the minister's study.

"I know," she said; "it's the worst place in Kansas for gossip. But I wasn't doing any harm. I just wanted to see him. Help me to go away, won't you, Miss Burton, before I—"

MISS BURTON put out a hand and laid it on the girl's arm. Inez was trembling like some hunted creature.

In the little study Howard was going over the proof, making a few corrections, rapidly.

When Rose came in she had gone up to his desk and said, "Here's the proof of your dodger Miss Clark brought."

"Oh, all right," said Howard absently, as if still removed in abstraction from his surroundings. His sister laid the paper on his desk in front of him. He looked at it with a start and exclaimed, "Oh!"

"Yes. And she's waiting for you to correct it."

"Waiting?"

"In the sitting-room. She's visiting with Miss Burton."

"Miss Burton?"

"Yes, I asked her over to spend the evening going over the music. It won't disturb you, will it, if we practice?"

"No."

He began to make his corrections on the proof, and when he was through he looked up at his sister.

"Did you invite Miss Burton over because—"

"Yes, Howard, I don't believe you can begin to understand what a wicked world this is. You are so good yourself, so free from any thought of evil, that even if you are a minister and make a business of preaching to others you are like a child in some things; and when it comes to women, you know nothing."

He did not answer her, only looked up from where he sat, his great dark eyes taking on a deeper hue, the lines of his mouth straightening out, his face expressing his feeling for his sister's thought of him, and more than that, his own real knowledge of her purpose. And silently he reached up a long arm, drew her down to him, and kissed her.

When Rose came back into the sitting-room Inez got up and took the proof and turned to the door.

"We will send them over in the morning so Mr. Chase can get them in time to distribute. Will you tell him?"

"Yes. He said six hundred would be enough."

"He needn't call for them. We'll see that he gets them."

Inez said it as if she were bidding farewell to something. But to Rose's surprise she sat for several minutes talking with Miss Burton about the scene at the fire, before she finally went away.

MRS. WILSON over on her porch waited what she thought was a long time for Inez to come out of the parsonage. Then she went into the house, put on her hat, came out and went up the street a block, crossed over and knocked at the door of a house on the corner.

A large woman came to the door.

"Oh, it's you, Mrs. Wilson. Come in. Come in."

Mrs. Wilson came in and brought with her the air of communicative eagerness that she knew would be welcome with her neighbor.

"I've a great piece of news, Mrs. Gale. You wouldn't guess it in a month."

"Something about the new minister?" asked Mrs. Gale shrewdly. She had hitherto her chair up close to Mrs. Wilson's, and the two women continued their talk in low but intimate voices.

Mrs. Wilson looked somewhat disconcerted.

"Well, yes; it is about the new minister; but it's about another person too."

"Is there another person?"

"There always is." You remember that young minister the Presbyterians had some six—no—eight years ago this fall, how in less than four weeks we found, you remember—"

MRS. GALE nodded her big head vigorously to indicate that she remembered. And she had good reason to remember, for the scandal created about the young preacher came very near ruining his career at the very start.

"Well, I've found out a thing about Mr. Chase that will make some folks change their minds about him. Why, almost for the first time I saw him I said to Mr. Wilson, 'The girls will all be running after him.' And it's true."

"You don't mean—" Mrs. Gale leaned forward, an eager look on her face, her eyes gleaming, her hands clutching the sides of her chair. "You don't mean—"

"Of course," Mrs. Wilson continued, ignoring Mrs. Gale's anxiety to know what Mrs. Wilson did mean. "Of course I don't wish Mr. Chase any ill, but—"

Never mind. If folks only knew what I know—"

"Well, what do you know?" Mrs. Gale lost her patience and put the question pointedly.

Mrs. Wilson drew her chair up a little nearer her neighbor's and dropped her voice still lower.

"You know Inez Clark?"

"Every one does."

"Of course. Everybody here in Red Hill has to know everybody," said Mrs. Wilson fretfully. "But I didn't mean that. Do you know what kind of a girl she is?"

"No, not specially. I see her at the movies every time I go. I suppose she's like most of the girls in Red Hill."

"She's different," Mrs. Wilson said impressively. "She's different. I said over a year ago to Mr. Wilson, 'That girl will make trouble for some young man some time.'"

"But isn't that what all of 'em do?" Mrs. Gale interrupted with unexpected shrewdness.

"Not like Inez," Mrs. Wilson said solemnly. The subject was not to be trifled with. "Inez is different. She isn't like the other girls. She's secretive. She won't talk. I've tried to get her to tell me about her father's invention, but you can't get anything out of her."

MRS. GALE listened with commendable patience. But when Mrs. Wilson paused for breath she interjected the question.

"But what has that to do with Mr. Chase?"

"Everything. You wouldn't suspect, to look at him, that a girl like Inez Clark would—well, I wouldn't have believed it myself if I hadn't heard it and seen it."

"Heard and seen what!" exclaimed Mrs. Gale.

"What I heard and saw. You see, I was sitting on my porch tonight about eight or half past, half past I think it was, when who should come up the street toward the Congregational parsonage but Inez Clark?"

"How could you tell?"

"Well, the street light is right across from Dr. Vaughn's, you know. And besides, there isn't a girl in town walks like Inez. She almost runs."

Mrs. Gale nodded as if agreeing.

"And besides," continued Mrs. Wilson mysteriously, "I had reason to know that she was coming to the parsonage about that hour."

"No!" exclaimed Mrs. Gale, her big eyes gleaming eagerly.

"Yes, I heard her say herself— But that is later. She went right up to the parsonage and went in."

"Who opened the door?"

"I couldn't see," Mrs. Wilson acknowledged the unfortunate fact reluctantly. "But she hadn't been in the house long before she went into the study. You know the study is right at the corner, and Mr. Chase's desk is right up between two windows."

"Well, it seems just awful, but in less than five minutes after Inez went in there, Mr. Chase put his arm around her and drew her right down into his lap."

"What!" Mrs. Gale exclaimed, the unexpected suddenness of the statement colliding with the enjoyment she was experiencing over Mrs. Wilson's revelation.

"Isn't it just awful? But the shadows on the curtains were very plain. I remember telling Mrs. Burton while she was getting those curtains—I was in the store that day—I said to her, 'Mrs. Burton, that curtain stuff is pretty thin. It will show right through.' She said it was for the study and was thick enough. Mrs. Burton is a woman you can't argue with, so I didn't say any more, but I remember I said to Mr. Wilson I thought the Ladies' Aid of the Congregational Church was skimping a good deal on the parsonage furnishings."

"But about Inez," Mrs. Gale said. "You feel sure it was her?"

"Why, I know it was. I heard her tell Mr. Chase she would be at the parsonage by eight or nine."

"You heard her tell him?" Mrs. Gale said incredulously.

"I was going into the office this morning to get a paper, and Mr. Chase and Inez were close together up by the type case. They seemed to be a good deal confused as I came in. I thought at the time it was a queer thing for a girl to say. But I heard her say it plain enough. Isn't it awful?"

"Awful," Mrs. Gale said like a big echo.

"If the people of this town knew what we know, Mrs. Gale—well, I don't know what would happen. But it would create a sensation all right."

"It surely would," Mrs. Gale nodded her big head vigorously. And then she added with a downward look, "Of course it won't go any further."

"Of course not," Mrs. Wilson exclaimed indignantly. "We don't want to make trouble for Mr. Chase. But I think it's awful about Inez."

"Yes, awful," Mrs. Gale assented, as her visitor rose to go. "But these pretty girls are always—"

"Yes, they are—" Mrs. Wilson said as she went out.

It's a small thing to remember; a great thing to do for a friend.

main business thoroughfare presented a bustling appearance. "Looks like K. C.," as the Expressman said to a farmer acquaintance.

Just then a boy came down the crowded sidewalk distributing dodgers. The Expressman held out his hand for one as the boy went by.

"It's a notice of the union meeting at the Congregational church Sunday night," said the boy. "Everybody's going."

"If everybody goes who didn't go last Sunday night there will be a crowd," said the farmer. "All the folks in our district planned to drive over if the storm hadn't come up."

"Elder Noyes is going to preach," said the Expressman as he read the dodger. "He's a pretty good preacher, but he can't say Amen to Mr. Chase. None of 'em can. He's smart, he is. I came pretty near joining the church first time I heard him. He's got a mighty takin' way with him. If he had my job there wouldn't be another express wagon in town. Folks would lose trains just to wait for him to come when he'd forgot to put it on the slate. But, say—" he dropped his voice, and slowly pulled at his scraggy mustache as he looked around and edged over a little nearer the young farmer, "say, have you heard the story that's going around about Mr. Chase and—" here his voice dropped so that the farmer had to bend his head to hear.

"You don't say!" His eye gleamed with interest.

"I don't say it's true. But it's going the rounds."

"I didn't know he was that sort." The young farmer grinned and his face showed eager interest. "Why, he hasn't been here three weeks."

"I don't say it's true," the Expressman insisted with some feeling. "I like Mr. Chase. Everybody likes him. You ought to have heard the talk on the street the day after Jake Seymour was blown out of the Cozy. Why, Mr. Chase made no more of carrying him across there to Meyer's drug store than if he had been a empty suitcase. I'd a had to put skids under Jake and back the wagon up to the sidewalk and take out the tailboard before I could load him in. But Mr. Chase he just took him up with one hand just as easy as— as— lying."

"You're sure you're telling the truth about this other matter?" said the farmer as he started to move along.

"No, I don't say it's true," protested the Expressman. "I only say it's going round. I can't believe it's true. But folks can't help likin' him. I took to him before he put his foot on the platform. I'd hate to see him get into trouble."

But the young farmer was already down the street retailing what he had heard to groups of young and old farmers, who listened with eager ears and gleaming eyes, for exciting news was scarce in Red Hill, and "this young preacher Chase" seemed destined to prove a godsend to the news desert of Red Hill and vicinity, to judge from the hungry and thirsty minds that feasted on the story that was "going round."

THE Congregational Church in Rutland, Vt., is giving its pastor, Rev. Arthur H. Bradford, D.D., to the Y. M. C. A. for three months' service in the training-camp at Fort Myer near Washington, D. C. In a letter to his church he says: "Sometimes I seem to feel the presence in our building of the mothers of the boys who come to us. They come by the hundred from the artillery regiments stationed here. A big fellow was standing by the counter the other night. He said he expected to go to France soon. 'Do you want to go?' I asked. 'Yes,' he replied, 'but I would like to see Mamma first.' He said it as simply as a boy of five. But anyone could see that he was a real soldier, ready for the call when it came. His home is in Alabama and he starts for France in a day or two, his wish not granted, but no complaint will be heard from him. He and two of his friends came to me after my service last Sunday, asking for Testaments. They will carry them to France, and you know there is a lot of satisfaction for me in the thought that my handwriting goes in many such little khaki-colored volumes, while the influence of our Y. M. C. A. work lives on in many manly hearts." Mr. Bradford's father, the late Rev. Amory H. Bradford, D.D., was pastor for many years in Montclair, N. J.

What My Church (Denomination) Stands For

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. 1 Peter 2: 9-12.

IT is suggested that this meeting be led by the pastor, but, while it may be led by the pastor, the success of the meeting will depend largely upon the extent to which his hearers are informed. All who have been saved by the blood of Christ become thereby members of the great Church Universal, which is the Saviour's bride. To some degree the interests of this Church Universal are hidden behind the multiplicity of man-made creeds, obscured by our denominational devices; yet there is a thread of unity throughout the whole, and there is one faith, one Gospel, one Saviour, one Father of all, one sinning humanity for which Christ died. Each denomination has a reason for its being. Each stands for the faith of Christ. Each places peculiar emphasis on some part of the whole truth of Christ. Each denomination has a glorious history; while the divisions in the church have destroyed its one-time unity, they have perhaps added to its present-time efficiency. Nothing is more worth while, after one is well grounded in the faith of Christ, than a study of one's own denomination, its history, its objects and its present aims.

The publication societies of the various denominations are prepared to furnish any inquirer with material for study of denominational history and purposes.

Am I Doing Anything I Would Condemn in Another?

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 2: 21-23, Luke 6: 37-42.

HERE again we have the old, old story of the mote and the beam—the old, old admonition to judge not, that we be not judged. Humanity must have needed this admonition or it would not have been so often repeated. "Who art thou that judgest another?" might well be the answer to every one who comes with criticism of another's actions. It is one of the peculiarities of our human frame that we delight to discover others committing the sins which we have been too weak to resist, and it is one of our little hypocrisies to exclaim in horror over this deed of another in the hope that we ourselves may escape detection. For this reason detectives after a holocaust seek out him who first cried fire. Sometimes it is necessary for one in the household of faith to be called to task and judged by his fellows. The Scriptures provide definitely for such occasions. It is the business of the elders and officials to inquire into the sins of the flock and to bring to repentance those whose actions bring reproach upon the church. They are instructed to go to such a one, to plead with him, to bring him before the congregation that the congregation may pass judgment, and in extreme cases to cast the unrepentant erring one out from the fold. We are told also if we have aught against any one to take with us a brother, to seek out the erring one and state our case. Until we have done this, we both break the rule of the Scriptures and the rule of common charity, in accusing another of any questionable action. Even then we do well to keep silence, unless we ourselves are clear of the same fault. We even do well to keep silence unless we can be sure that we are clear of other faults. It has been one of the principles of mankind through all the centuries that the judge must be above suspicion, learned, prudent, wise and just. If we are all of these we may dare pass judgment on our fellow; otherwise we had best keep silence, although we may pray in secret for the fault we think we have discovered. He who would judge his fellows must first so order his own life that no accusation can be made against him.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between Rural Women Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

I WONDER if this January day is the jolly one—agitter with icicles and tingling with cold—for you that it is for me!

I awoke this morning to find the sun streaming into my room in a glorious flood, and the little fat bird-neighbors, who usually quarrel on the bare trees outside, chatting away in the most cheerful fashion, with friendly "Squawks!" and "Chir-r-r-rs!" There was no doubt as to what side of the bed those wee fellows had gotten up on!

I laughed, and tumbled out too. And a little later I was leaning out the window with some crumbs. From where I stood, I could look down into a tree which was fairly aquiver with small bouncing forms—tawny puffballs on legs. And what a fuss, what a fuss!

Yet this morning it was a good-tempered fuss, I am glad to say. Ordinarily, that tree sounds like a family argument. First, the visiting cousins have their say, then the "in-laws," then the grandparents, then the children—then everybody all at once, in a rage. And they're the longest-winded quarrelers I ever listened to.

But this morning the sun seemed to have completely melted every one's ire and banished the customary "it's-all-in-the-family" disapproval. Hopping about gaily, with polite little comments, rapping their beaks playfully against limb and twig, arching their fuzzy necks, watching me and the crumbs without seeming to, they struck me as so comical and dear that I threw back my head and laughed.

It was a rude, crude thing to do; and I was well punished for it. For there was a great fluttering whirr, leaving the tree silent and empty.

Ashamed, I closed the window, realizing what it must be like to be only a few inches tall and to have a great two-legged animal lean down from the skies and yawp at one without warning or reason. Suppose, I thought, my little neighbors do not come back? How awfully I shall miss them!

But the hearts of birds are too full of love for that. And then, too, "crumbs is crumbs"—in these days of food-saving housewives! So there was a brown flash in the sunshine of my New York back yard. Over my neighbors' clotheslines (where the shirts flapped like the ghosts of scarecrows) came one little neighbor. Then there were three more arrivals; then a group. And once again the bare old tree was transformed with twittering, fluttering life.

Foolishly happy, I turned away, remembering suddenly that this was my day for visiting with you, my human neighbors. And I determined that our meeting today should be as full of sunshine and geniality, of blue skies and comradely chat, as possible. For I think we have all earned—after these weeks of sober and earnest neighboring—a little visit given over wholly to good cheer and sociability.

So, banishing until our next meeting all serious discussion and thoughtful planning, I have chosen for today the very sunniest and most sociable, the homiest and folksiest, of all the "adventures in neighboring" piled on my desk.

HERE is our first one, a heart-warming proof of what neighborly love can do toward breaking down barriers and uniting the hearts of a whole countryside:

DEAR MISS CONNOLLY: There were ten families of us, all strangers to one another, in a new settlement. For a year or so there was nothing between us: no sociability. Then, one day, one of us invited all the rest of us to her home, and then there formed a club without dues or officers. Our club meets once in two weeks. We simply talk, exchange housewifely ideas, and help the hostess with her quilting, sewing, or whatever else she wants done; while she furnishes simple refreshments. In the winter the meetings are held in the evening and the men come, too. Our little club has formed a great feeling of friendship between us all. Perhaps this isn't worth telling about, but it has been a big help to us. Mrs. H. W. S.

Indeed, this homey little "adventure" is worth telling about! It delighted me, because it is the sort of community service we are all capable of, no matter how busy or retiring we may be. And what a transformation such a club could work in a community which had nothing of the kind: nothing to draw folks together in a friendly, jolly way! From such small community acorns as this, very big oaks grow.

OUR next adventure is a gay little lark, with a message for all of us who have ever pined in a lonely city apartment or town house, where we had nothing to look out upon but strangers' windows. Little we dreamed, then, that we were neglecting a wonderful opportunity to neighbor. But—well, read the following:

Panto rime Neighboring

We came to the city of Syracuse to live, and knew not a soul there. My kitchen window, however, was so close to my neighbor's that we could at least see each other flitting to and fro, doing our work. And if the work drew us near the light, and our eyes met, we would exchange smiles and nods. While the fall lasted, we would occasionally shove up a window and greet each other.

As winter came on, it became too cold to do that. So we would pantomime. If it was her sweeping day, she would hold up her broom or duster; and I would respond with the wave of my flat-iron or mop, or the flourish of my dish towel. On baking day she would beat the mixture in plain sight, and later hold up some of the products of the morning's work. Her little daughter—who was between three and four years old—soon caught on; and she would hold up her doll or its clothes, its dishes or its rocking-chair. Sometimes there would be garments to mend or stockings to darn; and we would plucker up our faces to show that the task was distasteful or perplexing; then we would smile or laugh heartily.

Finally, I took the initial step, making the first call, although I was the newcomer. I went late in the afternoon, thinking she might be sitting down sewing. Instead she was very busy in the kitchen, ironing, and had also to prepare some light refreshments for her husband's Sunday school class, which they were to entertain that evening. She invited me to come to the kitchen, where her work lay. But I said: "No, not unless you will let me help you." She consented with a laugh, and I finished up her ironing while she prepared the refreshments. After sampling the goodies, I returned home. That call led to a genuine friendship, which lasted until circumstances separated us.

There, fellow adventures, doesn't that throw a new light on that old bugaboo, loneliness in a big town? And isn't it charmingly told?

OUR next adventure is a big, broad, sweeping one—an experiment which eventually blessed all the neighbors for thirty miles around. And yet it came about in the simplest way—from a very small beginning. Most any of us could start the same ball to rolling:

A Wire-Fence Telephone Line

You who have not lived in Montana cannot realize what homesteaders have to undergo. Long stretches of gray, rolling upland and rough hills are the landscape. And because Uncle Sam has been so generous in his allotment of lands—320 acres to a homestead among the hills—the shacks of the settlers are necessarily far apart.

Neighbor S—was a druggist in the town of G—, who banked for a strip of soil of his own. His resources, however, were limited. So he fled on his land, built a house, and got things to going. Then it became necessary for him to go back to G— and earn money enough to buy stock and implements, leaving his family on the land. Yet he did not want to leave his wife alone out there, with little children, so far from neighbors and with no means of communication.

So he bought two telephones—one for her and one for his cousin, who lived on the adjoining ranch—and connected them to the wire fence that surrounded the two homesteads. (About the first thing a settler does is to enclose his allotment with a wire fence.)

Therefore, if anything went wrong, his wife could telephone the cousin. Besides, the phone served to while away many a weary hour and ward off the blues.

Before long, Neighbor S— had made the other homesteaders see the sociability of it, and an additional telephone, here and there, was connected to the wire-fences of the region. Next, a little bunch of settlers over the hills began getting telephones, until they had all their line would hold. When the first group wanted to get in on that line, they said, "No, we can't admit you. But Neighbor S— can put in a switch if he wants to, for your accommodation."

Neighbor S— did this. The switches began to multiply, and connect with other lines; until the "wire-fence telephone" had so spread that it reached the regular telephone line into the town of G—.

And so Mr. S—'s little act of neighboring has borne fruit until thirty miles of territory occupied by thrifty settlers is beginning to blossom like the rose with happy homes, where the people are all wide-awake and actively in touch with every outside movement and interest. Mrs. I. F. Mc—.

ON the heels of that thrilling adventure comes one far simpler but none the less delightful. This account will, I feel sure, touch the heart and sympathy of every rural mother of young daughters. Perhaps it will interest the daughters, too—especially those who do not know how to sew and would give anything to learn. And I am wondering if it will not be read by some unselfish woman able and glad to perform the same service for her neighborhood:

Teaching Young Girls to Sew

I wanted to be of some real service in our little farming community; so I began to look about me. As most of the men of our neighborhood work in the city while the women and children do the farm work, I concluded that I might help the busy mothers by teaching their daughters to sew. I live next to the school-house, so I offered my services there.

The school committee gave me permission to give the lessons at my home during school hours, allowing the girls one hour and one recess-period away from school. The town furnishes the needles, thread and thimbles; the parents furnish the cloth; all other necessary equipment which I own they are welcome to use. The girls learn plain sewing, both hand and machine, and mending. Their school reports give credit for the work in sewing.

What these sewing lessons mean to the girls we can hardly estimate; but we trust it all goes to make them nobler women. To the mothers it means more than help with the family sewing; for, last June, all the mothers came to an exhibition of the sewing work, and we all became better neighbors. The girls are now beginning their second year of sewing with unabated zeal and a deeper feeling of true comradeship. Miss H. C. M.

How I should have loved a peek at that sewing exhibition! I can't help thinking how grateful some little folks are going to be some day—in the long-ahead future when these dear sewers are wives and mothers themselves—to Miss H. C. M. for her sewing class. For wee sleeves will go into tiny shirts just as they were meant to go, instead of all twisty; and small first-trousers will be so marvelously fashioned that not even the fellows at school will know them for home-mades! Oh, yes, that little sewing circle is going to be remembered gratefully all down through the generations to come. And surely no woman could build herself a greater monument than this.

And now, Christian Herald Neighbors, we have come to the end of our gayest, friendliest visit of the winter. It has been a happy hour for me—and I hope for you. I feel almost as if you had been sitting here with me, rocking and chatting and—perhaps—clicking your knitting needles as you talked. (For we all seem to be knitting these days.) But now the time to bid one another farewell—for another two weeks—has come. Before you leave, however, I should like to remind you of the importance of our next meeting and of getting to me as soon as you can your opinions on all that we discussed a fortnight ago: the founding of our club; the giving of helpful advice to the dear neighbor who has appealed to us for it; and the admitting (or not admitting) of the men folks to our little corner in neighborly good-will.

Meantime, fellow adventurers, good-morrow to you!

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold. Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp." The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights. It is called a boom by Asthma sufferers. For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities. It is a protection to those exposed. Cresolene's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use. Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps. Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 6421 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied your dollar will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing. Send a dollar today or ask Mr. Reefer for his free poultry book, that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry. (Advertisement.)

Panorama of the Goodyear cotton-growing project in Arizona at picking-time.

GOODYEAR
AKRON

Making the Desert to Bloom

"And he gave it for his opinion, that whoever could make two ears of corn, or two blades of grass, to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before, would deserve better of mankind, and do more essential service to his country, than the whole race of philosophers put together."

—Jonathan Swift.

DOWN in the Salt River Valley of Arizona, under the brazen sky and sirocco breath of the mesa, Goodyear is putting the desert to work.

Infertile plain and immemorial waste are now being made to yield up to mankind some portion of that bounty which is the common debt of earth.

Thirty-five thousand acres of arid soil are in process of development there for the growing of the finest quality of long-staple cotton.

Six thousand acres of this enormous tract already are producing such cotton, of a grade which experts tell us has no equal in the world.

* * *

The task that Goodyear faces in reclaiming this parched acreage has been from the beginning a most formidable one.

Barely 5,000 acres of the tract could be irrigated from the great Roosevelt dam, the remainder had to be watered from deep-drilled wells equipped with power pumping-plants.

In the work that has been done and is now going forward an entire regiment of men is employed.

Fourteen immense caterpillar tractors and 1,200 mules prepare the fields for cotton and attend the cultivation of the producing land.

The progress that has been made and is now being accelerated is only a presage of what will be accomplished.

Great ginning mills have been erected at Phoenix, Chandler, Tempe, Glendale and Polleson, with an oil mill at Phoenix.

It is planned to establish two model towns on the property, complete and modern in every respect.

Each will have, besides dwellings for employees, club-houses, hospital, warehouses, garages, machine shops, general office, store buildings and church.

In addition to its own endeavors in the Salt River Valley, Goodyear is encouraging small producers there by assisting them in every possible way.

From present indications it is estimated that in the valley next year a total acreage of 100,000 will be reached.

The greater proportion of the lint from the fine cotton produced will be used in the manufacture of motor car tires; the seed will be handled commercially in various forms.

On the basis of present prices it is computed that the aggregate yield from the district this year will approximate five million dollars.

* * *

In the strict sense, Goodyear is not and has never been a producer of raw materials.

It is Goodyear's chief function to convert raw materials into quality products for wide public use.

But where it is evident that by widening its sphere Goodyear can benefit its products and the public, this step will always be taken.

It was in this spirit that Goodyear established its own fabric mills in Connecticut, and that this new Arizona project was put under way.

The aim and the end of all such endeavors by Goodyear is a heightened merit and value in the products it builds.

The success with which such endeavors hitherto have been attended is seen in the unmatched popularity these products enjoy.

Goodyear Tires, Heavy Tourist Tubes and "Tire Saver" Accessories are easy to get from Goodyear Service Station Dealers everywhere.

Jesus Chooses the Twelve

International Sunday School Lesson for February 10. Mark 3:7-35

The Apostles and Why They Were Chosen

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

WE have seen how the teachings and deeds of Jesus aroused the mortal enmity of the leaders of Jewish religious and social life. Our last lesson showed him eating with sinners, disregarding a fast, and setting forth a new attitude toward the institution of the Sabbath. Today's lesson shows his popularity still growing and the opposition becoming more and more bitter. The "many" of chapter 2 who followed him have become in chapter 3 "a great multitude," and among them are others than Galileans, men from Phoenicia and Judea, even from Jerusalem itself and from beyond Jordan.

Naturally enough, the greater number of these poor people came because they had heard of the miracles he had wrought. They came with all their sick and thronged about him. How ignorant they were of Christ's supreme mission! How difficult for him to turn aside from ministering to the afflicted, to initiate the sweeping moral and spiritual revolution he was destined to produce! Yet he must devise means to reach earth's millions with good news, rather than Galilee's hundreds with temporary relief from life's trouble and pain.

Jesus Appoints Twelve Helpers

So, Luke tells us, he went up into the mountain and continued all night in prayer. When daylight came he was ready to proceed, and summoning his most faithful followers to his side he selected twelve, the beginning of a new and spiritual Israel in which all mankind may have a part. Their first duty was a privilege, "that they might be with him"; not to be, like others, constantly coming and going between home and trade and the Teacher, but to be his permanent associates, leaving all to be with him. They were to be disciples, learners, ready and willing. They were to listen, to watch, to heed and to imitate.

The Book of Acts follows the Gospels, telling us how well some of them succeeded. Prepared for usefulness by loyal discipleship, they became apostles, representatives, teachers, workers of miracles. Just as many were called but few chosen in the Galilean days, so even until now not all disciples became apostles. Mark tells of their future task as preaching and ministering. Christ selected them "that he might send them forth as heralds"; that is, as bearers of news of the greatest public importance. This was and is the first duty of a disciple after he has received his Lord's teaching: to spread the good news of the Kingdom of God. Who shall interpret the applications of Kingdom truth to all life, business and society, individual character and world politics? Christ is choosing them now.

A Characteristic Group

We strive to picture those twelve Jews as they stood on the green hillside in the morning light of that day so momentous for them and for the world. It was to send some of them to the ends of the earth and to bring others to shame and death. What manner of men where they? Christ showed, once for all, the capabilities of the common man. Later he added a genius, St. Paul, with culture and ability that make him tower above the others in Christian history. But none of these pioneers of the Kingdom were learned beyond the ordinary, none were notable before Christ called.

Peter was the most forceful and became the natural leader. He was impulsive and masterful. James and John were eager, ready followers, "sons of thunder," impetuous, loyal-hearted, if a little jealous for favor. James may have been the more dominating of the two, while John seems to have been the more affectionate. These three, Peter and James and John, were evidently the choicest spirits in the group, and the personal friends and confidants of the Master. From time to time Jesus withdrew from his disciples, but seldom left his trio far behind.

Andrew, Philip and Bartholomew were of the unobtrusive, quiet type, but fundamentally alert and useful. Each has left an impress upon the record. Matthew kept a record of the sayings of Jesus and treasured it for the future. Thomas was of a somewhat pessimistic type, but he was willing to die with Jesus and ready to confess him, when persuaded that Christ still lived. Nothing is known of James the Less and Thaddeus, nor of Simon, except his attachment to the Zealot or extreme patriotic party in Judea. They may stand for the vast multitude of obscure Christians, who, nevertheless, have the privilege of the fellowship of Jesus and a share, however humble, in the preaching of his Word. There remains Judas, who is such a riddle to us, his very baseness making it hard for us to imagine the good points which caused Christ to select him from among many. He is forever an object-lesson in the truth that no exalted privilege, no devoted service by the Christ, no place or station can render us immune from temptation and danger.

The Need for Leaders

Christ is still calling for apostolic men. The Church is still demanding leaders. The Sunday school is still drawing together choice groups of young people to hear the Master speak, and to see him going about doing good. Parents and teachers, sit in Jesus' seat! "As the Father hath sent me, even so I send you." Your little group of disciples must see Jesus through your personality and principles. Will they worthily represent him, and you?

When Jesus wanted to produce apostles, he selected certain men that they might be with him. Character is contagious. Good company does elevate, just as truly as bad drags you down. "Our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ—ye also may have fellowship with us." So runs the invitation of one of those twelve men. He welcomes you and me and all our boys and girls to "the glorious company of the apostles."

Who knows what tests time will bring to these children whom you teach today? Be like Jesus, give them your best, patiently teaching, forever showing the way. You will not lack reward, perhaps in future days here below, certainly when He comes to make up his jewels. I remember a certain class and its faithful teacher who sacrificed much. Diverse places and tasks claim her boys now, and perhaps one or two fell by the way; but there are those who think of her often with grateful love. She knew where Jesus could be found and, like Philip, her message was "Come and see."

Jesus' Brethren

Soon after the choosing, when Jesus had once more put his foes to flight, there came a day when he showed how he regarded those disciples of his. It was when his friends and family, misunderstanding him and fearing for his safety, came to restrain him. The possibilities of humiliation and friction were great. How wonderfully Jesus avoided disowning his kindred and still owned a higher claim than that of blood! It was not by shutting out but by bringing in. Looking round upon his disciples, he said, "Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." Are we indeed sons of God, brothers of the Lord Christ?

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Helping Home Department Bible Study

THERE are a million members in the Home Departments of America.

A condition of membership is that they shall agree to give one half-hour weekly to the Sunday school lesson and Daily Bible Home Readings. Such readings can and do form the basis of daily family worship in the home. These Daily Bible Home Readings are indicated in the lesson quarterly furnished to members of the Home Department. Sometimes the selections as to Bible book and chapter in which the readings are found are indicated on a weekly or quarterly card furnished by the school for insertion in the Bible, or in a yearly folder such as that issued by the International S. S. Association.

Oftentimes parents and Home Department members, who have not learned the names of the Bible books or the order in which they come, are hindered in using these Home Readings, for the readings are selected from different parts of the Bible, and they cannot easily turn to them.

What a boon, therefore, to such readers and to many busy people is the plan of the Christian Herald for the five months ending with April thirtieth, to print all the Lessons with the Golden Texts and all the Daily Home Readings in full in the form of a booklet! These Lessons and Home Readings indicate the day on which they should be read, and one has but to follow these selections day by day, to become familiar with the lessons and related material.

Through such reading the Bible itself should become more familiar and interesting as a Book and revelation of God's great plan.

But Home Department workers and members should know that this little booklet is but a step in a wonderful plan to make Bible truth interesting. In that booklet of the Lessons, Golden Texts, and Daily Readings, are found the texts which are to be selected for the thirty Bible pictures which the Christian Herald furnishes under its Bible Picture Study plan.

Who could measure the result in the Home Departments of America that would come by the increasing of the home reading of these lessons and other Scriptures? Over one hundred thousand persons participated in two previous Bible Studies directed by the Christian Herald. These testified that the months spent in searching for the texts to fit the Bible pictures, brought them immeasurable gain in knowledge of the Word. From their experience a little idea can be gained of the possibilities of the plan for all Home Department members. And even if one of the cash rewards is not secured, the memorizing of the many Scripture verses and the familiarity obtained with this body of precious Bible material will of itself be a greater gain than any cash reward. For the habit of daily searching of the Scripture is the finest contribution which can be made to any life.

But the big gain in this plan for the Home Department will come in the interest aroused in every home with both children and parents in Bible truth. For there is bound to be a discussion of Bible texts in relation to the pictures on the part of all.

The immediate thing to do for each Home Department superintendent, visitor and member, is to write to the Christian Herald for full information about this Bible Picture Study plan, and then to apply it at once to the Home Department for the lessons of these coming months. And when the Home Department visitor makes her next quarterly round of her Home Department members she will find an interest in the lessons of which she has not dreamed.

America Helping the Helpless

SORROW has its compensations. Human sympathy and helpfulness that come of it are the sweetest things of this world.

It has been the saddest Christmas season since the birth of Christ. Yet, in spite of this, or because of this, charity has been more bountiful than ever before.

Sympathy, richly laden with gifts, stretches today throughout the earth. The War Widows and Orphans, the persecuted Syrians and Armenians, the suffering people of Palestine, the victims of the Halifax disaster, the man-salvage work of the Bowery Mission, have all found a host of generous friends.

The Christian Herald funds for all the various lines of relief are receiving record contributions.

It might seem to the worldly mind that mankind having had so much of sorrow must be hardened to it, and that the cost of living had become so high that nothing is left to give away. But these generous contributions from all conceivable sources show how the spiritual side of the mind can count these material obstacles as nothing but incentive to give most plentifully out of the least.

The awful reign of death, destruction and devastation, which shows how small and helpless we are, also makes us forget our selfish strivings and reminds us that, after all, mankind is but a poor little family in sore need of all the sympathy and aid that can be exchanged. In the presence of a horror before which human power seems helpless, human love and helpfulness loom up as the potent, abiding, unquenchable forces of all time.

Dearer than life, which is held so cheap, more precious than property, which is so ruthlessly destroyed, better than wisdom, which is so easily confounded, is human sympathy, which disaster only strengthens and despair only sweetens, and which is swept across the seas and earth like a host of angels out of heaven.

The following acknowledgment was received from the Finance Committee of the Halifax Relief Fund, December 14, 1917:

"The Christian Herald,
New York, N. Y.

"The Finance Committee beg to acknowledge with grateful thanks your generous contribution of $5,000 to the funds of the Relief Committee received through the Mayor of Halifax.

"Yours faithfully,
"H. A. FLEMING, Treasurer."

A Week in the World's News

shown in marked contrast with the lumbering operations of the War Department's antiquated machinery.

FOR FREE ARMENIA. It was announced from Petrograd on January 16 that Premier Lenine and the other members of the Bolshevik government had issued an official decree to the people of Turkish Armenia promising the support of the peasants and workers of Russia for the complete independence of Armenia. Lenine also demanded of Turkey the return to Armenia of the populations removed by force from that country. It was also announced on January 16 that the peace negotiations at Brest-Litovsk, broken off when the Germans withdrew their adherence to the principles of self-determination, had been resumed. An attempt on the life of Lenine was reported on January 14, four shots having been fired by an assassin at the automobile in which the Premier was riding. It was reported on January 16 that the British government was prepared to enter into informal relations with the Bolshevik government in Russia. It was also reported that the diplomatic corps at Petrograd had intervened between the Bolshevik and the Rumanian government and had forced the release of the Rumanian Minister to Petrograd who had been arrested because Rumania had detained Bolshevik agitators, caught trying to spread disaffection among Rumanian troops. On January 18 it was reported that Lenine had ordered King Ferdinand of Rumania arrested and brought to Petrograd and that Ukrainians and Bolsheviks were fighting at Odessa.

The armistice on the Russian front was continued for another month from January 12, but the Bolshevik Cabinet made strenuous efforts to strengthen the forces facing the German line, appealing to all of Russia for food and supplies, declaring that many soldiers were starving. Reports continue to come out of Germany indicating that the fiasco at Brest-Litovsk in which Leon Trotsky as the lone advocate of Russian democracy, supported only by the impotence of disintegration, had by calm and steadfast adherence to the righteous cause of oppressed peoples placed Germany and her allies in such a light that their insincerity was blazoned before their own people. One German paper, Rheinische Westfälische Zeitung, declared "Von Kuhlmann would win the prize for showing how a brilliant military position may be ruined."

There is still some evidence that Germany is approaching a political crisis.

It was suggested that a military dictatorship might result from the practical failure of the negotiations at Brest-Litovsk. It was declared, however, that Germany would never consent to evacuate the occupied Russian provinces until all the issues involved in the war were settled.

FOOD CONTROL EXTENDED. President Wilson on January 14 issued a proclamation to further promote the conservation of foodstuffs, by extending the licensing system of the food administration. Some of the principal industries included in the new proclamation are the salt water fishermen, peanut industry, barley malting, brewing, canning of peas, beans, salmon, tomatoes and of sardines, manufacturing of tomato products and all products derived from wheat or rye, dairy feeds, horse and mule foods, stock, hog and poultry feeds.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. Walter Spoorman, a former German officer, was arrested January 14 as a German spy, having been caught at Norfolk in an attempt to blow up an Army magazine while posing as an officer of the American Army. . . . On January 16 there were 112 vessels held in New York Harbor for lack of coal. The United States Navy on the 15th released large quantities of coal in order that British and French munition ships might be able to sail. . . . Commander Bagley of the American Destroyer "Jacob Jones" sunk by submarine on December 6, arrived on January 15. Reporting the events connected with the sinking, he said that after the destroyer had gone down he found himself swimming beside a seaman who hailed him cheerily and said, "Captain, where do we go from here." The answer was a 23-mile row in the direction of the Scilly Islands which were still seven miles away, when the captain and the man with him were picked up by a British boat. . . . A bill was introduced in Congress on January 15 to amend the selective draft law so that all men reaching the age of 21 would become available for military service. . . . A report came from Russia on January 15 that the former Czarina was hopelessly insane, and that her little son, the former Czarevitch, was seriously ill with his former tubercular disease. . . . Bolshevik Premier Lenine was reported on January 15 to have demanded of the Constituent Assembly, which was finally called after many delays to meet on January 18, that it proclaim Russia a socialist republic and that it provide for its expropriation of all land and property. The opening of the Assembly on the eighteenth was marked by rioting and street fighting. The Bolsheviks charged that a plot had been organized by Kerensky who was said to be hiding in Petrograd. The first session of the Assembly, 244 to 155, elected as president M. Tchernoff, a social revolutionist and a member of the Kerensky cabinet. . . . Reports from Switzerland on January 15 told of the closing, owing to lack of coal, of the German munition factories in Karlsruhe and in seven other large German towns.

The War in Europe

ONCE more the line of battle from Flanders to the Swiss frontier has seen little more than that intense artillery fighting which has become the rule rather than the exception in recent months. Near Lens and Cambrai British troops raided German trenches, and the Germans returned the courtesy. Verdun, a smoldering fire for two years, blazed up again, the Germans attacking twice, with liquid fire on January 12 and under an intense artillery fire on the 14th. The attack on the 12th broke down under French artillery fire, and the other attack was dispersed by the French as it was forming. The French also raided German trenches north of Rheims.

German light naval forces bombarded the British North Sea port of Yarmouth on the night of January 14. The bombardment lasted about five minutes, doing little material damage but killing three persons and injuring ten.

In Italy the German-Austrian troops have been put on the defensive by the Italians who, on January 15, struck on two fronts. Just East of the Brenta River, the Italians, advancing under the protection of intense artillery fire and heavy fog, drove the Austrians from the crest of Monte Assolone, the possession of which gave the Austrians observation positions and artillery emplacements looking down the Brenta and across the plains toward Bassano. French batteries aided the Italian advance. The Austrians lost, besides the position, 291 prisoners, and some war material and were defeated in desperate efforts to retake the position although the Italians were forced to retire slightly from the destroyed Austrian trenches, which were untenable. On the lower Piave front, east of Capo Sile, the Italians extended their bridgehead on the eastern side of the Sile River and held the captured trenches against heavy counter attacks.

U-boats during the week sunk six British vessels of more than 1600 tons while two under that tonnage were sunk; two Italian vessels of more than 1500 tons were sunk and five French ships of over 1600 tons.

Sir Auckland Geddes, Minister of National Service of Great Britain announced on January 14 that the Empire had enrolled 7,500,000 men in the fighting and labor forces during the war to date, more than 4,000,000 men being enrolled at the present time. He announced that it would be necessary to recruit into the British Army from the labor forces at home an additional 450,000 men during the present year in order to maintain the fighting forces at full man-power. He also announced that there would be no extension of conscription to Ireland.

Reports came through Geneva on January 17 of a new mutiny at Kiel on January 7 among the submarine crews and some of the crews of other naval vessels. It was reported that 38 officers had been killed. German U-boats are reported as accumulating a wholesome fear of the depth bombs, which are reported to have been greatly improved since the American Navy began its operations.

General Pershing, on January 15 reported 39 deaths, of which 27 were from pneumonia, three from meningitis and only two from injuries. On the same day it was announced that, in the week ending January 11, a total of 235 deaths had occurred in the training camps at home, of which 149 were due to pneumonia, there being 6821 new cases of pneumonia during the week.

British air raiders on January 14 successfully bombarded the railway station and munition factories of the German city of Karlsruhe.

What Five Missionaries Saw

In contrast with this is the story which the Rev. William B. Hall, of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, brought from the Lebanon mountains in Syria and Palestine.

"A woman came down from a mountain village to Bruunnanna, weak from her long tramp, unable to last until she reached our relief station," he said. "She took refuge in a partly closed archway, cold and damp, near a hotel. From the hotel clothing and medicines were taken, but it was too late. Next morning the woman died and was buried under the pines below the road. She left four children there, clothed in thin rags. The father had already died from privation. It was still wintry and the rain dripped through the roof. A widowed aunt learned of their condition and took them in, but she had no food. Two days later the youngest child died, and the aunt had to dig a grave with her own hands.

"Three days later, one of the little sisters followed father, mother and brother. Then the case was called to our attention. I tell this because it is typical of what went on everywhere in that district, and is still going on. Into that same archway where the woman died, two other women, two girls and a boy, exhausted by hunger, crawled and died. One night in a wintry storm I saw a flickering light there and found five children huddled over a few burning pine cones. We found the starving everywhere. It is estimated that there were a thousand deaths a day in the Lebanon mountains. These acute famine conditions were brought on in large part by Turkish officials, who cornered the food supplies for speculative purposes for themselves. 'God has forsaken us!' was the cry heard again and again as the people faced starvation and death. The story to be written when the present winter has passed will be even more terrible to read."

These are only a few details of the story of how Turk and Teuton have worked together.

INTEREST—ENJOYMENT FASCINATION

These will make your evening hours happy in the National Bible Picture Study

IN WHICH $5,000.00 IN CASH WILL BE AWARDED TO THOSE WHO CHOOSE, FROM OUR SHORT LIST, THE BEST BIBLE VERSES FOR THIRTY PICTURES

DO you want an entertainment that will make your life happier now, and give you a hundred memories upon which you will look back with pleasure in after years?

Do you want to enjoy yourself hugely—so much that many of your petty cares will be forgotten, and your mind will be filled with cheerful and active thoughts?

Do you want, while being so filled with content and while living in such a joyful atmosphere in which all the family will share, to be at the same time working toward a cash reward, which may be paid you for your results in the entertainment?

Do you want to be learning about the Bible, to be absorbing Bible knowledge and wisdom, to be stocking your memory with Bible texts, to be adding, therefore, to your life's fund of resources? Do you want, almost without knowing it, to have a portion of the Bible become more familiar to you than it could possibly become if you actually studied this portion in the ordinary way?

In the event of a tie for any prize the full prize tied for will be awarded each final tying participant

If you want any or all of these things, you want the National Bible Picture Study—you want to engage in that simple home Bible entertainment. Can you think of a way to enjoy yourself more, to gain more? What would you do with $1,000.00 in cash? You have it within you to gain that, if you succeed in the National Bible Picture Study well enough!

One of the actual pictures of the Bible Picture Study (No. 14) is shown to the left. Couldn't you pick, out of a short list of about 2,000 Bible verses, one to fit that picture? Competition in the Study without expense is made possible by the rules, which are free on request.

When you send for the complete Outfit in the $5,000.00 Cash National Bible Picture Study you will be supplied all the pictures that have appeared up to the time your subscription starts, if you ask for them, and you will be sent the Reference Book of Bible verses, called International Bible Readings, and the Answer Book. Small photographs of these two books appear here.

The Reference Book contains about 2,000 Bible verses, chosen from among the 31,101 verses that make up the Bible. Only verses that appear in our short list will be accepted as answers for the pictures. That makes the Study short, thoroughly interesting from beginning to end, and eminently fair to all.

The Answer Book consists of 30 blank pages, on which you will write down the verses you select from the list as best fitting the 30 pictures.

By looking at this week's picture, No. 14, over to the left, and seeing how a verse is selected to fit it, you will see at once the method in the Picture Study. Just choose the verses you believe are best illustrated by the 30 pictures. Write them down in the Answer Book and send them in. It will fascinate you, fill your heart with happy ambitions, and you may win first prize just as well as any one else. When sending for the Christian Herald send for the Outfit too—you will think that one of the happiest and wisest acts of your life!

"The Eyes of the Navy"

THE Navy is still in urgent need of binoculars, spy-glasses and telescopes. The use of the submarine has so changed naval warfare that more "eyes" are needed on every ship, in order that a constant and efficient lookout may be maintained. Sextants and chronometers are also urgently required.

Heretofore, the United States has been obliged to rely almost entirely upon foreign countries for its supply of such articles. These channels of supply are now closed, no stock is on hand in this country, and it has become necessary to appeal to the patriotism of private owners to furnish "Eyes for the Navy."

Several weeks ago, an appeal was made through the daily press, resulting in the receipt of over 3,000 glasses of various kinds, the great majority of which has proven satisfactory for naval use. This number, however, is wholly insufficient, and the Navy needs many thousands more.

All articles should be securely tagged, giving the name and address of the donor, and forwarded by mail or express to the Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, care of Naval Observatory, Washington, D. C.

Articles not suitable for naval use will be returned to the sender. Those accepted will be keyed, so that the name and address of the donor will be permanently recorded at the Navy Department, and every effort will be made to return them, with added historic interest, at the termination of the war.

As the government cannot, under the law, accept services or material without making some payment therefor, one dollar will be paid for each article accepted, which sum will constitute the rental price, or, in the event of loss, the purchase price, of such article.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

For the Patriots of the Home

MR. HOOVER has issued a new home card which takes the members into the confidence of the Food Administration. It gives the facts of the situation, in order that the members may adapt their housekeeping to the new conditions. The card asks for a porkless Saturday, one wheatless meal each day, a wheatless Tuesday, one meatless meal each day, a meatless Wednesday, and a monthly allowance of three pounds of sugar to each person. Human foods contain three principal elements:

Protein—meat, beans, fish, poultry and milk. We eat 80 per cent. more protein than we need.

Fats—butter, cream, lard, bacon, beans and cooking oils. We eat 240 per cent. more fat than we need.

Carbohydrates—wheat and other grains, sugar, potatoes and vegetables. We can eat corn, oats and potatoes as well as wheat.

Use all the milk and butter you need, but don't waste any.

Eat less pastry and fried foods. Lick the plate clean, serve small portions, buy less, hoard nothing.

All who oppose this gospel of conservation are giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

Many persons, when asked to sign the card pledging themselves to follow the directions of the Food Administration, raise the question why corn, potato flour and other foodstuffs are not shipped to the Allies so that they may make the substitution. The answer is that European nations are already using 20 to 50 per cent. of corn, potato and other adulterants in their bread. The British government requires 20 per cent. adulteration in wheat bread, and will permit 50 per cent. Adulteration beyond 50 per cent. does not make a healthful loaf. In the case of corn, this commodity in the form of meal cannot be shipped, because it would spoil in transit. As to the whole grain, the people on the other side have no mills to grind it. Furthermore, corn bread cannot be baked successfully in bakeries abroad. In addition, it does not keep well, and with the dearth of paper in Europe it would be difficult to carry home.

"How the War Came to America"

Valuable Free Book Setting Forth the Details Set to the Readers of the Christian Herald

THE United States government has published an official book telling "How the War Came to America"—detailing the policy of subterfuge and aggression that forced the most peaceable nation in the world into the greatest war in history.

For two long, trying years, Wilson held out for peace, preached peace, made peace the fundamental plank of his platform.

And then Wilson demanded war.

It was the most sweeping, the most revolutionary change of policy ever made by a modern government, fraught with mighty consequences for the whole world.

It is your duty as an American citizen to understand the motives that induced Wilson, the Peace President, to declare war.

This booklet is one of the most important compilations of contemporary history that could be printed. Besides detailing the international events that led up to the declaration of a state of war, and elucidating their significance in the light of international law, it contains three of the most important speeches of President Wilson, printed in full. Thus it is a book to be kept for reference.

“What! My Car?”

“Yes! skidded—and it’s up to you. You failed to provide the chauffeur with Tire Chains. Only good luck saved your wife from paying the supreme penalty for your negligence. She’s on the way to the hospital painfully injured, but the doctor thinks she’ll pull through. You’d better hurry to the hospital and then report to headquarters.”

How strange it is that disaster must come to some men before they realize that all makes and types of tires will skid on wet pavements and muddy roads when not equipped with Chains.

These men do not appreciate until too late, that by failing to provide Weed Anti-Skid Chains they expose their families to injury and death.

The time to provide against accidents is before they happen. Don’t wait until after the first skid. Put Weed Chains on all four tires at the first indication of slippery going and you will have quadruple protection against injury, death, car damage and law suits.

Better Gardens!

NEVER before have business conditions been so disturbed as in the present year. Trained men have been withdrawn from every line to put the country on a war basis.

And the seed trade has been no exception to the rule, hence we urge our customers to send in their orders at once, before the Spring rush begins.

It will be a vast help to us in doing our part in feeding the country to be able to execute orders in January and February that in ordinary times come to us in March and April.

So, whether you buy from us or any other seed house, send in your order early.

Peter Henderson

THE home garden is today of vital importance to the nation. Apart from the obvious economy, it is a tremendous factor in food conservation, and from month to month the need becomes more urgent, not only of "more gardens" but also of "better gardens."

Make your garden a better garden this year by intelligent use of the space you have—not only by better methods but by planting seeds of known quality. The initial cost of the seeds is one of the smallest items in your garden, but it is the most important, and you cannot get the fullest results unless you have started right.

Henderson's seeds are tested seeds. Many of the methods of seed testing in use today originated with the founder of our firm, and these have been improved from year to year. Our seventy-one years of success in our business of seed raising, testing and selling has given an unequaled experience that is back of every packet of seed we sell.

Not only must your seeds be the best but your methods should be right. And to help in this we have prepared a booklet entitled "Better Gardens." This consists of extracts from the book, "Garden Guide and Record," which we have published for a number of years for the use of our customers only—"Better Gardens" will be sent to all who send us ten cents for our special offer below:

"Everything for the Garden"

is the title of our Annual Catalogue. It is really a book of 192 pages, handsomely bound, with a beautifully embossed cover, 16 color plates and 1000 half-tones, direct from photographs, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a library of everything worth while, either in farm, garden or home.

A Remarkable Offer of Henderson's Seed Specialties

To demonstrate the superiority of Henderson's Tested Seeds, we have made up a Henderson Collection, consisting of one packet each of the following six great specialties:

Ponderosa Tomato
Big Boston Lettuce
White Tipped Scarlet Radish

Henderson's Invincible Asters
Henderson's Brilliant Mixture Poppies
Spencer Mammoth Waved Sweet Peas

In order to obtain the largest possible distribution for our annual catalogue "Everything for the Garden," we make the following unusual offer: Mail us 10c and we will send you the catalogue and our booklet, "Better Gardens," together with this remarkable "Henderson's Specialty Collection," enclosed in a coupon envelope which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as 25c cash payment on any order amounting to one dollar or over.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWS WEEKLY FOR THE HOME

The congested terminal of the West Shore Railroad at Weehawken, N. J., where thousands of cars of delayed goods for New York and for export block the traffic of today

ONE hundred miles of freight trains, or between 10,000 and 15,000 cars, tied up on the railroads in and around New York; two hundred and more ocean cargo-carriers tied up in New York harbor without coal, and an immense jam of freight congested on the wharves; uncounted thousands of cars of coal stalled along the roads, besides thousands of "empties" waiting to reach the mines; essential industries throughout the country hampered by lack of fuel, and a zero temperature from the Mississippi to the Eastern coast descending upon heatless homes—these were the factors that rendered necessary the most drastic economic order ever issued in this country, shutting down practically all non-essential industry in the Eastern half of the country for five days and for nine succeeding Mondays.

Announcement of the forthcoming order by Fuel Administrator Garfield on January 17 created a tremendous sensation in business circles, and Washington was flooded with protests. The Senate called Dr. Garfield before its Manufactures Committee and questioned him as to his purpose. Later in the same day the Senate, by a vote of 50 to 19, passed a resolution demanding postponement of the order for five days. But the action came too late, for, a half-hour before the vote was taken, Administrator Garfield had definitely issued the order. His reasons for it, as well as the scope of it, are concisely stated in his answer to the Senate.

"The order suspending the operation of industrial plants in portions of the United States," Dr. Garfield wrote, "was issued only after deliberate consideration, and will, I firmly believe, aid effectively in providing coal for domestic consumers, for the prompt bunkering of ships carrying necessary war material abroad, and for the relief of the serious congestion at the docks and at many points in the section covered by the order. I still believe it should stand. To delay the application of the order would only add to the congestion. To permit factories with a coal supply to operate during the period of suspension would allow many producing articles least essential to the war to continue, while some producing articles the most essential would be compelled to shut down. Moreover, continued production by those well supplied with coal would delay, if not defeat, the relief contemplated by the order."

The Great Midwinter Shutdown

The Country Suspends Business to Relieve the Traffic Congestion. Days of Real Sacrifice Endured Cheerfully. President Wilson Justifies the Fuel Administrator's Order

IN face of the storm of protest, President Wilson issued a statement approving and justifying the order, in which he said: "This war calls for many sacrifices, and sacrifices of the sort called for by this order are infinitely less than sacrifices of life which might otherwise be involved. It is absolutely necessary to get the ships away; it is absolutely necessary to relieve the congestion at the ports and upon the railways; it is absolutely necessary to move great quantities of food; and it is absolutely necessary that our people should be warned in their homes if nowhere else; and half-way measures would not have accomplished the desired ends."

New Yorkers went through their first "Garfield Monday" in a game way. They took patriotically the no-heat, shut-up-shop order, and made the best of things. It was no small matter, this throwing out of work, temporarily, of at least 1,500,000 men and women in one city and the loss by them of probably more than $3,000,000 in wages. But there were no particular signs of discontent. Other cities sacrificed in proportion. The order was carried out patriotically and quite as well as had been expected. All department stores were closed. All factories, save those engaged in the exempted classes of work, chiefly war work, were idle. Transportation lines cut down their movements by 20 per cent. or more. Small shops, unless engaged in the selling of food or of drugs, kept their doors locked. Offices remained shut, and some of the big office buildings were almost deserted. Pretty much everything was virtually heatless and lightless. Only 90 violations were reported and these were mostly technical, rather than intentional. Just how much coal was saved it is difficult to say; but it is certain that a good many thousands of tons were conserved toward building up a supply which will bring the city back to normal. One leading dealer estimates the saving on Monday at over 20,000 tons.

In the other large cities throughout the country the conditions were much the same. They reported the number of workers temporarily idle as follows: Chicago, 600,000; Philadelphia, 350,000; Boston, 250,000; Milwaukee, 200,000; Cleveland, 200,000; Pittsburg, 200,000; Cincinnati, 175,000; Baltimore, 160,000; Buffalo, 70,000; Detroit, 300,000. It is estimated that altogether 5,000,000 workers were idle for the day.

The Garfield order makes eleven permanent priorities in coal deliveries. Hospitals, domestic consumers, other institutions under priority favor must be supplied before coal may be delivered to any other interest. At the end of the five days' shutdown there was not enough coal in New York to fill these eleven priority requirements. Many plants which shut down found themselves unable to get coal for a permanent reopening.

Railroad congestion is general throughout the eastern part of the country, but the port of New York is the choked neck of the bottle. Shipments through Philadelphia for foreign delivery have been nearly 50 per cent. below normal peace-time tonnage, and at other Atlantic ports below common. Shippers had tried to ship nearly everything out through New York, and that port, despite its facilities, was unable to handle the great bulk of traffic shot into it. Meanwhile, coal in hundreds of thousands of tons has been piling up at the Jersey terminals across from New York. Because of the railroad congestion ice in the river, scarcity of tugs and barges, shortage of labor, and other causes assigned one after another, the coal famine in New York continues.

SINCE the shutdown went into effect, 20,000 to 30,000 tons of coal a day—less than half the normal need—have been delivered to New York. More than two hundred ocean ships were waiting at Atlantic ports for coal and were being bunkered at New York at the average rate of fifteen vessels a day. On Tuesday, January 22, twenty-four were coaled and cleared. During the five days, 77 ships were coaled at New York, seventeen more than the arrivals, and on January 22 there were 81 waiting for coal; on the 25th, only 55; but it was stated that all ships loaded with vital military necessities had been sent to sea.

The five-days' shutdown period ended with heavy snowstorms sweeping the Eastern coast and Great Lakes sections, further complicating the situation. Dr. Garfield has indicated that the food situation is even more serious than that of fuel. He exempted from his order "every sort of food handling, manufacturing or distributing agency."

Our Nation's Wealth in Coal

Easily Leads the Rest of the World Combined—Causes of the Present Coal Famine

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

THE age of muscle-fighting has passed. The age of machine-fighting has begun. This war is being waged by machinery, and in machine-fighting the greatest of assets is coal. The war is not confined to the battlefield. For every soldier sent to the front there are ten behind the lines. They are to be found in our steel mills, our machine shops, our munitions factories and in the many other great industries which give us our supplies. All of these are based upon coal, and if wars are to continue and nation is to fight to the death against nation, the nation that will finally survive is the one that has the most coal.

According to estimates made by the International Geological Congress which met in Toronto, Canada, just before the war began, the whole world has altogether just about 8,000 billion tons of coal and of that the United States has more than one-half. Three-fourths of all the coal upon the earth is to be found in the North American continent, and the bulk of that outside the United States belongs to our Canadian allies. They have just about one-fourth as much as we have. Europe has only one-sixth as much coal as North America and only about one-fifth as much as the United States. Asia has only one-third as much coal as we have, and Australasia and Africa put together have less than one-sixteenth of the coal reserves of the United States. It will thus be seen that as far as coal is concerned we could fight the whole world and have billions of tons of fuel left after the supplies of all the other nations have been exhausted.

Dr. Charles G. Gilbert, curator of the Bureau of Mineral Technology of the National Museum of Washington, has prepared a graphic coal exhibit of the resources of the United States and the world. He has made blocks showing the proportionate amount of coal in the various countries, and our great block could swallow that of any other country on earth, and leave a vast space around the edges.

The whole is a practical illustration of our industrial future. It shows that North America for the next few thousand odd years must be the industrial center of the world, and that the United States must forever be the heart of that center. As for the coal famine of today, that is a temporary matter.

I GIVE herewith, in round numbers, in billions of tons, a table prepared by the congress I have referred to, showing how the coal-producing countries of the world stand as to their coal reserves. This table is not made up by United States authorities. It comes from the geological experts of every country. It may be relied upon as correct:

	Short tons
United States, including Alaska...	4,231,000,000,000
Canada.....	1,360,000,000,000
China.....	1,097,000,000,000
Germany.....	466,000,000,000
Great Britain and Ireland.....	208,000,000,000
Siberia.....	191,000,000,000
Australia.....	182,000,000,000
India.....	87,000,000,000
Russia in Europe.....	66,000,000,000
Union of South Africa.....	61,000,000,000
Austria.....	59,000,000,000
Colombia.....	29,000,000,000
Indo-China.....	22,000,000,000
France.....	19,000,000,000
Other countries.....	69,000,000,000
	8,147,000,000,000

From this it will be seen that we have more than nine times as much coal as Germany and more than twenty-three times as much as Great Britain. The only countries that compare with us in our wealth of black diamonds are Canada and China, and so far their mines are practically undeveloped. With the exception of one or two mines, the great coal fields of China are not used at all. In many places the coal for local consumption is dug out with picks, and in some of the Chinese cities, coal is so valuable that it is ground to dust and mixed with dirt and sold in balls the size of a biscuit.

There is no mention here of the mines of Japan. That country has some excellent deposits, but they trenches between. Suppose we made it 500 feet thick and 500 feet high, or as tall as the Washington Monument, which no tank could climb over. The great wall of China, built to keep out the Mongols, is only forty feet high. This wall of coal would be twelve times higher. That wall at the top is less than twenty-five feet wide; this wall would be twenty times thicker and it would be more than four hundred times as long. Its actual length would be more than 630,000 miles.

And now suppose we add to the wall the small amount of coal we have mined. If we should take every black diamond we have dug from the earth since our first mines were worked, near Richmond, Va., until now, the amount would extend the fortifications less than fifty miles longer. It would only be four-tenths of 1 per cent of the whole.

These figures are amazing. Nevertheless, according to Dr. Campbell they include our coal to a depth of over 3,000 feet, and as the coal grows scarcer and scarcer we shall carry our mines down almost double that distance. We might add 50 per cent to the estimates of our possible coal supply, and not be far out of the way.

Moreover, the coal fields of the above estimates include only those of the United States proper. They leave out the enormous coal beds we have in Alaska, some of which are being opened up by the new railroad now building. We have both anthracite and bituminous coal there and a vast amount of lignite, which may be more valuable in the future. I saw something of the coal fields during my recent trip to Alaska and I have talked about them with Dr. Alfred H. Brooks, who has spent more than fifteen years exploring the territory and who knows more about geology than any other man living. He says a low estimate of the coal we have there would be 150,000,000,000 tons, which is just about two hundred and fifty times as much as the coal we used in 1917. Of course, a great part of the Alaskan coal does not compare in quality with that we now mine, but the territory has great beds of good coal and the railroad has already reached the Matanuska fields, which have fuel fit for the navy.

IT will surprise many to know that the great bulk of our coal lies west of the Mississippi River and that the most of it is in the northern half of the great plains and in the Rocky Mountains. The Rocky Mountains have more coal than all Europe and the good coal of the great plains is three times that of Germany. There are 500,000,000 tons of anthracite in the Rockies, and that part of the country has plenty of good soft coal as well. The amount runs high into the billions of tons. It includes more than one-fourth of the bituminous coal of the United States and that means coal that will make steam and can be used to make coke.

There are about 11,000,000,000 tons of good soft coal in Oregon, Washington and California and something like 45,000,000,000 tons in the northern part of the great plains. All of that is good for steaming, and this means that those regions will some time become industrial centers.

Our greatest deposits of bituminous coal lie in the Mississippi basin and the Appalachian Mountains. It is from those regions that we get the bulk of the coal of today. The Appalachian region has a great bed of soft coal which begins in Pennsylvania and Ohio and runs south through Kentucky, West Virginia, Tennessee and Alabama, almost to the Gulf of Mexico. That bed has some of the best coal of the world, and there is enough of it to supply all the industries of the east for hundreds of years. So far we have not mined more than one-tenth of it, and there is still in the neighborhood of 500,000,000,000 tons within 3,000 feet of the surface.

are hard to mine. During my travels there I visited a coal property at Nagasaki, which has fifty miles of tunnels under the Pacific Ocean. That coal is being taken out for the Japanese navy. It is the same in South America. The chief coal mines of that continent run under the ocean off the coast of southern Chile. I have visited those mines, riding on an electric road under the Bay of Concepcion, with the ships sailing overhead.

AND now let us look at our own coal reserves. I have before me some figures made this year by Dr. Marius R. Campbell, one of the leading experts of the Geological Survey. They will show us how much coal we have and how long it will probably last. We need not be worried about the immediate future. The amount so far used is only four-tenths of 1 per cent of our available supply, and we shall be mining coal down to our grandchildren of ten generations or more. We can keep up our present rate of production, including all the coal we are taking out for fighting the Germans, for three or four thousand years, and still allow an enormous amount for waste in mining and handling.

Some of the mines of Belgium which are now worked by the Germans are 4,000 feet deep. They are the deepest coal mines of the world, but the mining of the future will probably be carried to a depth of 6,000 feet, or more than a mile underground.

The estimates of Dr. Campbell as to our available coal include those down to a depth of only 3,000 feet, or a little more than one-half mile below the surface. His estimates run into the thousands of billions of tons. I shall not give them in figures, but Dr. Campbell says the amount is so great that if it could be dragged forth and laid in one pile as solid as it now lies in the ground, it would form a cube more than eighteen miles wide, eighteen miles thick and eighteen miles high. There is coal enough in the ground to make a wall a mile wide and half a mile high around the outside of the United States and leave some to spare. The length of our boundary, according to the coast and geodetic survey, is less than 11,000 miles, and this wall of coal would be almost as much longer as the distance from New York to Chicago. Or we could cut the wall down and run it around the United States in a series of great fortifications with wide

China Again Flood-Swept

Missionaries at Paotingfu Tell of Thousands of Villages Submerged with Loss of Life and Much Suffering

IT would almost seem that the measure of China's afflictions is full. Pestilence, famine, war and revolution she has borne in the past. Disastrous floods have swept her fertile valleys, too, but the recent inundations, which were first reported about a month ago, are now learned to be the worst visitation of the kind she has had to face in half a century. The united body of Christian missionaries in Paotingfu has sent a statement of their appalling situation to the Christian Herald, which we commend to the consideration of our readers, who have helped China many times in the past. Her missionaries and people, recalling those former occasions, have no hesitation in telling of their present troubles and their urgent needs. The missionaries' letter, which is signed by the American missionaries and native pastors, is given below:

"PAOTINGFU, NORTH CHINA, Dec. 4, 1917.
"To the Editor of the Christian Herald:

"Your generous help to the needy in all parts of the world has encouraged us to seek your aid in behalf of the flood sufferers in the Paotingfu section of Chihli Province, China. The enclosed maps will give an idea of the relative size of the flooded section and its distance from Peking and Tientsin. There are also photographs giving an idea of present conditions, as seen by members of our committee.

"The American papers have doubtless had some account of these floods, the worst in this province for fifty years. An unprecedented drought through the spring and early summer reduced the crops in many places to half, or less than half, the normal amount. In the middle of July the rains began, and continued with more or less severity for two months and a half. The dried-up mountain streams soon became rushing torrents. Whole families and whole villages were swept away and lost. In the plains, the water spread out over miles and miles of country, submerging even the protecting dykes; and thus caught there, it stands in places ten or twelve feet deep over the good farm land. Only expensive machinery could pump it out, or a long lapse of time dry it. Along the mountain river-courses the land is dry; but it is now covered with a deposit of rocks or sand which makes it unfit for farming.

"Between two and three thousand villages are affected by the floods just in this section. Many thousands of homes have been destroyed. Hundreds of lives have been lost. Some of the crops already gathered were lost in the floods; others still standing were submerged. Both grain and fuel will be very high this winter. The average village population live on the produce of their own farms, each little family in good years raising all its own food and fuel, and selling beside enough to buy cloth, which is made at home into clothing and shoes for the family. A bad crop, or a calamity like this year's, puts hundreds of thousands of people out of their modest comfort into helpless misery. They have no outside resources. Hence, at the present time, children, especially girls, are being sold in the cities to reduce the number to be fed at home. Very old people and little children may have to pass the winter in small tents of matting.

Society has already sent $150,000 to Peking and Tientsin, to be paid for labor on roads, and for shelters. Only 1,120 men from our section—less than one man to a village!—can get work on this road, there are so many other needy sections about Peking and Tientsin. The money sent for shelters has all been spent in Tientsin. Five hundred suits of winter clothing and $2,100 Mexican have been sent by the Peking Flood Relief Committee for immediate relief and for a little industrial work for women, but there will probably be no more from that source. A few hundred dollars can be raised in our Christian community, and the government is distributing some relief.

"The government relief sometimes means only a few coppers for each individual, and at most not more than one dollar.

"We think that $5,000 gold would enable us to start industrial work. A larger sum would mean a larger number helped for a longer time. In these villages there are those who could weave cloth, or make matting, or manufacture woven willow suit cases. A few implements would set up a man in the fishing business.

"By the time this letter reaches you the coldest weather will be beginning. At this time, suffering has made the whole world akin. Cannot we, whose hearts are tender over the dangers and deprivations of our own loved ones in far-away France, 'do our bit' to make the world more livable for Christ's loved ones in China?

"In behalf of the poor and needy,

THE Associated Press cabled from Fengchen, China, on January 16, as follows:

The hotbed of the pneumonic-type plague prevalent here and in other parts of Shansi Province is at present Paotechov, on the Hoang-ho, west of Ningwufu, and the villages surrounding it. The natives are dying by scores in the streets.

Appeals for help are being sent broadcast by the American doctors recently sent into the province to investigate the plague conditions.

Later dispatches say the measures taken locally are inadequate and the commissioners are telegraphing to the government urging it to take energetic steps to combat the epidemic.

The missionary medical men are making efforts to keep the plague outside the great wall and to close the entrances of Upper Shansi. Dead bodies are lying in the streets and the coolies refuse to remove them.

regular work. We should like to put them on their feet; to give them some wage-earning occupation till the land is clear again. We want to find shelter, clothing, food, and fuel for the most needy, distributing relief in return for work done, so far as possible.

THE movement in Congress for a more efficient administration of the multiplied war activities of the government took definite shape on January 19, 20 and 21. On the 19th Senator George E. Chamberlain of Oregon, chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, declared at a luncheon in New York City that the military establishment of America had "fallen down because of inefficiency in every bureau and department of the government of the United States." Representative Kahn of California, speaking at the same luncheon, agreed in substance with Senator Chamberlain. On the following day there was made public the text of a bill agreed upon by practically all the members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, both Republicans and Democrats. The bill was introduced into the Senate on the 21st, and came up for debate on the 24th. As drawn, it provides for a War Cabinet, to have general and specific jurisdiction over all of the war-making activities of the government, subject only to the President. The proposed War Cabinet is to consist of three distinguished citizens, of demonstrated administrative ability, to be appointed by the President. It was expected that the bill would find many opponents in Congress, but expressions of both Congressmen and Senators indicated that the bill would win much support in both houses.

On January 22, however, President Wilson issued a statement flatly opposing the whole proposition. The President declared that "Senator Chamberlain's statement as to the present inaction and ineffectiveness of the government is an astonishing and absolutely unjustifiable distortion of the truth." The President declared that the War Department had "performed a task of incomparable magnitude and difficulty with extraordinary promptness and efficiency" and that such mistakes as had occurred were insignificant in comparison with what had been accomplished. He stated that he had not been consulted about the proposed reorganizations and declared his belief that measures already undertaken as the result of experience were more likely to be effective than the War Cabinet plan. He expressed the opinion that the plan proposed "would involve long additional delays and turn our experience into mere lost motion." He came to the defense of the Secretary of War as "one of the ablest public officials I have ever known." The President closed by declaring, in regard to Senator Chamberlain's statement, "I am bound to infer that that statement sprang out of opposition to the Administration's whole policy rather than out of any serious intention to reform its practice."

The bill proposing a War Cabinet came up in the Senate on January 24 on a motion to refer it to the Military Affairs Committee. Before the close of the session it was so referred. Senator Chamberlain rose at 12 o'clock to speak on a question of personal privilege, speaking for three hours not only in explanation of his charge of inefficiency against the War Department but bringing before the Senate part of the evidence upon which he based that statement. Senator Chamberlain outlined some of the events which had led to the proposal of a War Cabinet, bringing before the Senate a letter from President Wilson in which the President had declared his opposition to a munitions ministry, largely on the basis that the establishment of such a ministry would delay and impede the effective conduct of business, and partly because he did not consider it feasible under the peculiar structure of our government. Senator Chamberlain declared that in 24 years of public service he had never had his integrity impeached. He said, regarding his personal difference with the President, "There are great policies at issue between us . . . which may involve the very life of the country and possibly the civilization of the world." Regarding the speech which he had made in New York, he declared that it had been given extemporaneously, but that he had been correctly reported. He had the clerk of the Senate read a verbatim report of the speech. He then presented a letter from President Wilson, quoting the paragraph in which the Senator had declared that the military establishment had fallen down, and he presented also his reply to the President, with which he transmitted a complete copy of his speech and in which he admitted the correctness of the paragraph and explained to the President, at some length, that his statement had been in connection with a discussion of America's historic lack of any military program. Proceeding he stated "The President challenges me, of course, to the proof of my statement, to which statement I adhere and which I now repeat." While admitting that there are men who might not see in the same element of testimony had been sent to the witness for verification, but he said the complete report would soon be available. Speaking of the ordnance department he stated that America stood today unprepared, borrowing heavy ordnance and machine-guns from France, due in part to the fact that since 1914, although supplied with appropriations, the ordnance department had done absolutely nothing. He summed it up thus: "Here we were from August 1914, until the declaration of war in April, 1917, with the ordnance department lying supinely upon its back, making no plans, constructing no gauges, manufacturing no dies, doing absolutely nothing to ascertain what were the possibilities in raw material and of manufacture." He discussed had resulted from lack of equipment and lack of care, and while he did not dispute the statement of the Secretary of War that the death-rate in the camps had been no greater than among the same class of the population at home, he declared that the rate under proper conditions might have been greatly lessened. In support of his testimony he quoted the testimony of General Gorgas, Surgeon General of the army, and as an evidence of the general inefficiency he showed that practically all of the great military camps had been located without consultation with the American army's master physician.

Senator Chamberlain showed as evidence of the failure to function, the turning over of the purchase of all supplies of clothing by the Quartermaster's Department to a civilian, for whom the Quartermaster-General became in effect a rubber stamp. He praised the work of the civilian, but criticised severely the adulteration of army coats with shoddy.

In answer to the President's charge that he, the President, had not been consulted, the Senator told of a visit by himself and Senator Hitchcock to the White House in which the whole situation was discussed and remedies suggested, the visit resulting in the letter in which the President had opposed the erection of a separate munitions department.

In closing, Senator Chamberlain said: "If America is going to play any part in this war she will have to get at it pretty soon. . . . The only way to speed up on preparations—the only way to get 'over there'—is to arouse America to the necessity of the time and the danger of the crisis. When once aroused, I have no fear but that America will rise in her might and make an example of sacrifice, of courage, and of patriotism that will make the brightest pages of our old history pale with insignificance as compared with the fighting of our boys on foreign soil."

Following the Senator's speech, Senator Kirby spoke in defense of the Administration, and the Senate voting then to refer the bill to the Military Committee, adjourned until Monday, January 28, when it was expected that the bill would be put before the Senate with a favorable report and that the final fight upon it would develop in an attempt to refer it to the Naval Affairs Committee, which Committee probably would not again report it to the Senate.

While the opposition of the President seemed to insure ultimate defeat of the proposition, Administration leaders, who conferred with the President during the day of the 22d, were told by the Chief Executive that under the present organization the war record of the government had been one of great accomplishments, and would result in placing abroad by next June twice the number of Americans originally planned. He suggested that in such a gigantic task mistakes were to be expected.

Secretary Baker, on January 25, took two steps in answer to the attempt of the Senate to reorganize his department. He asked an opportunity to appear before the committee of the Senate to make a public statement summarizing what has been done by America in the war. This hearing was set for Monday, January 28. Mr. Baker also appointed as Surveyor General of all army purchases, Mr. Edward R. Stettinius of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. Mr. Stettinius handled the details of the great allied purchases here before America became a belligerent.

CHANCELLOR VON HERTLING REPLIES TO PRESIDENT WILSON. Before the Main Committee of the German Reichstag, on January 24, Chancellor von Hertling took up the fourteen propositions stated in the recent statement of President Wilson to Congress and discussed Germany's attitude on those in which the interest of her Allies were not paramount.

Before entering upon his discussion of the President's address, he told the committee that he expected a favorable outcome of the negotiations with

Chancellor von Hertling's Reply to the President in Detail

1. The demand for an end of secret diplomacy. "We are quite ready to accept this proposal."
2. The freedom of the seas. "This also is demanded by Germany as the first and one of the most important requirements for the future."
3. The removal of economic barriers to trade. "We, too, condemn economic war, which would inevitably bear within it causes of future warlike complications."
4. Limitation of armaments. "As already declared by us, the idea of limitation of armaments is entirely discussible."
5. Settlement of Colonial claims according equal weight to the principle of self-determination of peoples and to the interests of governments. "I believe that for the present it may be left for England, which has the greatest colonial empire, to make what she will of this proposal of her ally. This principle will have to be discussed."
6. Evacuation of Russian territory. "We are dealing here with questions which concern only Russia and the four allied powers. I adhere to the hope that, with recognition of self-determination for the people on the western frontier of the former Russian empire, good relations will be established, both with these peoples and the rest of Russia."
7. Evacuation of Belgium. "At no time did the annexation of Belgium form a point in the program of German policy."
8. Restoration of French occupied territory and of Alsace-Lorraine. "The occupied parts of France are a valuable pawn in our hands. Here, too, forcible annexation forms no part of the official German policy. The conditions and methods of procedure of the evacuation which must take account of Germany's vital interests, are to be agreed upon between Germany and France." Germany he said, could not discuss the cession of Alsace-Lorraine to France.
9. Readjustment of Italy's frontiers along lines of nationality. Referred to Austria.
10. Opportunity for self-determination of the peoples of Austria-Hungary. Referred to Austria.
11. Evacuation of Roumania, Serbia and Montenegro and international guarantees of the integrity of the Balkans. Referred to Austria.
12. The future government of nationalities within the Ottoman empire and the opening of the Dardanelles. Referred to Turkey, but implied that Germany was against the opening of the straits.
13. Establishment of an independent Polish State. Independence of Poland must be settled by Germany and Austria-Hungary.
14. Association of nations for mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity of all. "When all other questions are settled Germany will be ready to discuss the question of a league of peace."

evidence the same proof of inefficiency which appeared to him he declared "I felt as an American citizen and I feel as a member of this distinguished body that it was my duty to say the thing that was in me. If I succeeded in making a rift in the clouds and letting the sunlight into the dark places where the American people were entitled to go and to see, I feel that my efforts and the efforts of my colleagues, for whom I entertain the highest respect, would not have been in vain."

Regarding the charge of distorting the truth Mr. Chamberlain said: "I rather think, Mr. President, that it is not that I have distorted the truth, but I have sometimes feared that in the multitude of cares and responsibilities that have devolved upon the President of the United States, he has not been at length the process by which America failed to get immediate deliveries of rifles and machine-guns, although it provided for eventual deliveries of a superior article of each. He discussed also the developments in the Quartermaster's Department.

Regarding Mr. Baker's testimony he stated: "Now I am going to show by Mr. Baker's testimony, that he did not know it, and that is the reason why I am saying that our distinguished friend, the President—the premier of all the great statesmen of the world, if you please—recognized as the leader of thought in this great international cataclysm, and I say Amen to it—did not know the truth, and I did. He must have gotten his facts from his distinguished Secretary of War, and he, in turn, got them from somebody else,

Into the Heart of Russia

THE key to every change in this ever-changing world is always found in some personality. One of the men back of the Russian Revolution was Prince Tcherkesoff of Georgia. Next week Maynard Owen Williams will bring you a personal interview with this prince, philosopher, anarchist and revolutionary, through whose eyes you will see the soul of revolutionary Russia.

Education follows the flag and disregards the thermometer, as you will learn next week in the story of the Farthest North School.

Dr. S. Parkes Cadman will occupy the pulpit next week with a deeply spiritual message on "the full meaning of the incarnation."

Next week also the Neighbors will gather once more to relate their adventures.

More important, perhaps, to many than all of these will be the announcement of the leaders in the Second Bible Picture Contest.

able to ascertain the truth. If he has relied upon some of those who have come before our Committee he does not know the truth, and from the lips of some of those who have testified and who are closest to him, he cannot find the truth—not because there has been a disposition to deceive or mislead our distinguished Executive, but simply because they, too, are so situated in the multitudinous affairs of this great crisis that they cannot ascertain the truth."

The Senator then proceeded to give his evidence. He stated that it was not yet possible to furnish the complete evidence taken by the Military Affairs Committee since the report of each and if those who furnished the evidence knew the facts, they lied."

He then outlined the shortage conditions in a number of the military camps, as developed by the testimony of the commanders of these camps. He showed that the commander of one camp, a soldier of experience, had urged that measures be taken to end the crowding of the men, prophesying an epidemic if the crowding continued. But the condition was only remedied effectively after the epidemic had occurred, after two thousand men had passed through the Base Hospital. He brought letters to show that men had not received proper care in the hospitals and that deaths

Lincoln and His Religion

OUR English word "king" is derived from an old Anglo-Saxon word "cynning," meaning "one who can." In the old days he was king who had power. We do no violence to the right use of words or to the facts of history when we speak of Abraham Lincoln as a kingly man. It took power to rise from his lowly estate to the heights from which, in manhood, he spoke to the nation and to the world. It took power to smite ancient error as he smote it, and to restore order to a chaotic state. Like another Thor, he leveled mountains, raised pillars and erected temples. No mythical Scandinavian deity ever had a more unconquerable purpose.

No man—no mere man—has a surer claim to earthly immortality than Lincoln. What Stanton said of him is true: "Now he belongs to the ages." His biography is almost unmatched among the annals of men. Strange elements combined to produce a body, mind and soul of mighty mold. It is a miracle of Providence that out of the humble cabin in Hardin County, Kentucky, came the ambitious boy, the studious youth, the self-taught surveyor, the skilful lawyer, the wise administrator, the sagacious diplomat, the far-sighted statesman, the tender-hearted philanthropist. He is our Alfred the Great, our Cromwell, our Chevalier Bayard sans peur, et sans reproche, our Sir Philip Sidney.

"Nature, they say, doth dote,
And can not make a man
Save on some worn-out plan,
Repeating as by rote:
For him her Old World molds aside she threw,
And choosing sweet clay from the breast
Of the unexhausted West,
With stuff untainted shaped a hero new,
Wise, steadfast in the strength of God, and true."

WITH all his greatness, due to traits which give unique luster to his name, Lincoln was human and lovable. His soul indeed was like a star, but it did not "dwell apart." He had dignity with humility; he was resolute, but gentle; firm, but always friendly. His face was seamed and sad. His was the earnestness of a great soul born to a great destiny; and yet, like Hamlet's friend, he was a man of "infinite jest." Most practical of politicians, he was also an idealist. He dreamed dreams and saw visions. Rarely is a seer a close reasoner. This man of vast outlook into the eternal world, the world of lights and shadows which elude the sordid selfish soul, had also the gifts of a philosophic mind. He was a poet as well as a logician. His was the eloquence of simple yet perfectly chosen words. His letters and addresses contain some of the most beautiful sentences in our literature.

What was this man's religion? In his childhood he became acquainted with the Bible. From it he derived his great rule of life, the Christian principle of equity. In all his dealings with men he adhered strictly to that rule. He was only a lad when it became evident he was in love with righteousness. He had borrowed a book from a neighbor. While in his possession the book was injured. Rain, beating through the cabin cracks, stained its pages. When he returned the book, he called the owner's attention to the damage, and was permitted to work for him until the book was paid for. Everybody knows about the incident of the money left in Mr. Lincoln's hands when the village postoffice was closed in the little Illinois town. When the balance was called for, he went to a trunk in his room and produced the money to the last cent, and in the very coins in which it had been deposited when the office closed.

Lincoln's honesty was simply the expression of a perfectly straightforward mind. He saw fact and truth with unclouded eyes. He added passion to his vision, enthusiasm to his virtue. He said: "Douglas does not care whether slavery is voted up or down; but God cares, and humanity cares, and I care."

IT was a feature of Lincoln's character that he was incapable of cherishing the memory of an injury to himself. There seems to be little doubt that, years before Mr. Lincoln became a figure of national prominence, he was engaged as counsel in a lawsuit in Cincinnati, in which Mr. Stanton was an associate counsel. Stanton had never seen Lincoln before, and said to a friend, "What does that long-armed creature intend to do in the case? Lincoln had expected to argue the case, but Mr. Stanton assumed that duty, though it is said he made use of some of the notes the Springfield lawyer had prepared. It was not long after this episode that the "long-armed creature" invited Mr. Stanton to become a member

Lincoln was a total abstainer, and among the earliest speeches he made were earnest pleas for temperance. There is great wisdom in his advice: "Do not worry; eat three square meals a day; say your prayers; be courteous to your creditors; keep your digestion good; exercise; go slow and go easy. Maybe there are other things that your special case requires to make you happy, but, my friend, these I reckon will give you a good lift." In many a business office Lincoln's motto hangs on the wall: "I do the very best I know how; the very best I can; and I mean to keep doing so until the end. If the end brings me out all right, what is said against me won't amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, ten angels swearing I was right would make no difference."

Character has its basis in convictions. The justice, courage, sincerity and moral wisdom of this man were rooted in his faith. Of it he spoke when he said:

"I know that there is a God, and that he hates injustice and slavery."

"I see the storm coming, and I know his hand is in it. If he has a place and a work for me, and I think he has, I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. I know I am right, because I know that liberty is right, for Christ teaches it."

"The time for the enactment of the emancipation policy can be no longer delayed. Public sentiment, I think, will sustain it, many of my warmest friends and supporters demand it, and I have promised God that, if General Lee was driven back from Pennsylvania, I would crown the result with the declaration of freedom to the slaves."

"When I left Springfield, I asked the people to pray for me; I was not a Christian. When I buried my son, the severest trial of my life, I was not a Christian. But when I went to Gettysburg and saw the graves of thousands of our soldiers, I then and there consecrated myself to Christ."

OF course Lincoln was maligned, grossly caricatured and bitterly calumniated. Blind prejudices assailed him as few public men have been assailed. It was a part of the price he had to pay for the peerless privilege of the leadership of a nation in its greatest crisis. He must have suffered keenly—all the more so because himself conscious of utmost rectitude. But his experience did not embitter him. He carried with him into the eternal world "the triumph of a soul serene." Thus he illustrates the ancient words, "Great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." Lincoln was on friendly terms with God, and "when God giveth quietness, who then can make afraid?"

Since Lincoln's martyrdom, since the scales of prejudice have fallen from our eyes, the nation sees what those who stood near the great President and knew him intimately had always seen: That he was as rich in goodness as in common sense; that no selfish motive or petty pride had place in his heart, and that no stain of dishonor mars the beauty and wonder of his career.

EDMOND FREMONT ALBERTSON, of his cabinet. This same Stanton later stood among the group of watchers at Lincoln's death-bed.

In his twenty-three years at the bar, Mr. Lincoln had not fewer than 172 cases before the Supreme Court of Illinois, and frequently appeared before the United States Circuit and District Courts. Moreover, he was often chosen to arbitrate important issues. In all this practice he came into contact, and often into conflict, with rude and hot-tempered men. Some of these were offended by Mr. Lincoln's words and acts, and often expressed their anger. But he never willingly made any man his enemy, never willingly allowed any man to consider him a personal foe. The true Christian speaks when Lincoln says: "I have read the Beatitudes of Jesus. I have sometimes thought I might claim the benefit of the one that pronounces a blessing upon those who hunger and thirst after righteousness; but if that fails me, possibly I may come in among the peacemakers. As a peacemaker a lawyer has a superior opportunity of being a good man."

SYSTEMATIC education of school children in problems of democracy and community life, which is about to begin nationally on request of President Wilson, as set forth in his recent letter to school officers, will take cognizance of after-war conditions and the whole future trend of American life. The lessons will teach children the privileges and obligations inherent in the government. Writers who have prepared the leaflets realize that the war will bring permanent changes in American life and are striving to make school children conscious of the process of readjustment. Emphasis will be laid upon the continuance of efficiency during peace. The production, distribution and conservation of food will be featured, with the purpose of emphasizing the cooperation that is necessary to meet the fierce industrial competition that will follow the making of peace.

The Russian Peasant and the Land

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

Received January 3, 1918, through American Diplomatic Mail. Passed by Russian Censor

RUSSIA has a hundred million peasants, more or less, and to understand them and their desires is to have a good clue to coming events in this land of magnificent churches, endless plains, imperial monuments, and runaway soldiers.

A peasant is a peasant, wherever you find him. The only fair way to study him, however, is to trail him to his lair. We found a man who knows the peasants well and who was planning a trip among them. Little knowing the danger of arrest, mobbing, suffocation, and over-eating, we asked if we might accompany him. Misery loves company and we started out in a jolty train that started half an hour late, in a driving rain. I had hardly left the station door before it seemed to me that a trip of a hundred miles to meet peasants was entirely unnecessary. It seemed as though there were a million of them, all going in the opposite direction. In Russia, they have a peculiar system of inducing democracy and breaking down class lines. They put the second-class coach at the rear of the train, opposite the third-class waiting room, and vice versa, so that in the rush for the train there is such a whole-hearted mingling of the ghosts as any society leader would delight in. I was traveling second-class, and in order to get to my coach I had to meet, in a more or less formal way, most of the third-, fourth- and fifth-class passengers. That made it very nice, for it served as a sort of introduction for the time when I should travel fourth- and fifth-class myself, as I did before the night was over.

Along toward morning, when I had discovered that it was quite out of the question to sleep in a small compartment where the air was used over and over, and that standing in the corridor as a snubbing-post for other travelers was not conducive to comfortable repose, the train jumped the track and several of the cheap coaches crumpled up and spilled their contents around the landscape, which, since it was entirely dark at the time, was not being highly appreciated anyway. There was a rumor that three lives were lost.

We had to change trains in a drizzle and were lucky enough to secure places on the inside of a fourth-class coach. The Professor, on the plea of studying human nature, curled up his six feet five and sat on the top-most of three shelves, which enable four Russian peasants to travel where a palace car steer would die of overcrowding. There were at least two hundred puffing peasants in that stuffy coach and not a window open. One peasant had brought an antiquated sewing-machine as a small part of his baggage, and that kept the door from closing for a while. But not for very long. So they made a man move from his place on the aisle floor, and dragging the sewing machine completely inside, closed and hermetically sealed the door.

We had started at eight in the evening and by six in the morning had gone sixty-five miles. Entering the little station of Atkarsk, we consumed gray bread and tea to make up for the sleep we had lost. By nine, the enterprising authorities had corralled some drafty box cars from the junk heap and kindly placed them at our disposal. Not only that. They furnished us an asthmatic engine as well. We climbed into one of the cars and took our seats on the long boards, which had been specially upholstered in slivers for our benefit.

I went up the track a few yards, and, by way of kicking the kinks out of my frame, picked up four or five small pebbles and began throwing them at a convenient and unmistakably lonely milepost. Alas, I had forgotten that I was in Russia and that the despotic old days of freedom had passed. A soldier, with glaring eyes and leveled gun, came charging toward me. I noted at once that his bayonet was not fixed, which cheered me, though I would have manuring and rotation of crops has brought it up to a point of high production, he is free to exile himself to Siberia—which already has most of the enterprising farmers of Russia—there to work out his dreams on his own land. This means that the producing brains will be automatically exiled to a great distance from the hungry hordes in Russia's growing industrial cities, necessitating much transportation to bring food and stomachs together.

Every peasant, politician, and political economist has a different story to tell. One advocates individual ownership under the Stolypin law of 1910. Another, communal ownership with the peasants living in villages and going out many versts to till their farthest fields. Some want the big estates, on which modern machinery and scientific farming are producing food for Russia, broken up and given over to small farmers, —the man with the hoe supplanting the gang-plow. Some want all the large landlords to be displaced without compensation, whether the landlord has debts for most of his land, or is free from obligations. Others want full compensation to be given but the estates to be broken up.

In general, the peasants want more land, without knowing whether they can work it or not. Communal ownership has become an obsession and they stand for that, with frequent redistribution of the plots so that the skilled man, who has husbanded the strength of his soil, must give it over to another and take up land on which a single variety of crop has been grown for years, and upon which no fertilizer has ever been put. Where wood is scarce, manure, mixed with straw, is burned as fuel and the land is rapidly deteriorating.

We visited a peasants' meeting, presided over by the village school teacher, who admits that the whole flock follow his leading. Pity the peasant, when politicians, instead of pedagogues, secure the following of these simple souls! For then the Russian republic will be rotten to the core. That time may not be more than a decade away among a people eighty per cent. of whom do not read or write. Russia has a hundred million patient but ignorant members in her flock, and the fate of the world may depend upon who is their bell-wether. Near Bolanda, there is one of five managing stations for an estate of 100,000 acres, owned by a rich pomieschik. This man is getting twice the return from his land that the small farmers are getting from theirs. He uses more than a hundred McCormick binders, together with rakes, mowing machines, seeders and baling presses in proportion. But the peasants want to divide this vast and profitable estate among ignorant men, who have neither the knowledge nor the equipment to utilize it properly. So far, there has been no trouble or violence beyond the taking of some hay, and the pasturing of some animals belonging to some Little Russians on the Count's land.

When the Revolution came, the Count let his peasants have more than half his land for grazing and plow land. Much of this land which he loaned them was not utilized. He had to give the peasants 720 tons of grain to keep them from want. One of the managers thinks that a peasant should be able to feed his family from the product of 16½ acres and has himself not only fed his family but also sold 200 bushels of grain enjoyed the ludicrous spectacle more if I had seen, as I did later, that his cartridges were not in his gun but in his hand.

In terrified tones he demanded my documents. Of one thing I will boast. My documents are second to none. The seal wafer is as red as the reddest and just as large, and the writing is in the lovely type of illegible scroll that was formerly affected by such chirographists as enjoyed making nesting birds and other decorations with a few strokes of the pen. That passport was indisputable, but the soldier, suspecting me of being a German spy, blowing up what was left of the railroad after the wreck, was not satisfied. Reluctantly I pulled forth a special pass from the Russian War Department.

I explained in perfectly plain English, that I had neither tried to steal the roadbed nor take a mile out of the long ride by destroying the mile-post. At that, the engine shrieked and we rode away, with the soldier still trembling beside his gun, and his cartridges still in his hand.

Bolanda is a village of wide cobbled streets which no one uses and doll-houses of squared logs, plastered over with mud and decorated with jig-saw puzzle edges. Each window has wooden blinds and a geranium plant and the tiny homes are banked up to the lower level of the windows to keep them warm. We stayed in as homely a place as one could find. In the great parlor, where we interviewed the village Solons while our host smoked his long pipe, there were paper flowers and knickknacks on the tables and real flowers and a rubber plant in the windows.

The Russian peasants at present are advocating the communal ownership of land, laboring under the vain delusion that in this way the farmer will get all that is coming to him. The experts are working out a norm which each peasant can till. If an enterprising peasant does not like the thought of a small norm, which must be exchanged with others when the pressure of population demands it, although his careful a year from 22 acres. The Count allows eleven acres to each family on his estate and the men and women work part time for him, at from one to three rubles a day, with three meals provided.

We visited the estate and saw the care with which the farming problems are worked out. We saw the long-legged, loop-nosed hogs, the sturdy horses and the lanky, intelligent wolf-hounds for the chase. The manager says that there is as yet little on this estate to be proud of, yet he gets twice the yield that the small farmer gets from the same kind of land. Some of the latter use a small plow, drawn by five horses, which occupy the time of a driver who rides and a plowman who walks. In one district, a single farmer under the communal system farms thirty-seven distinct pieces of land, many of them widely separated. Out of 2,000 inhabitants of the communal district of Kluchie, only those who were independent farmers under the Stolypin law live outside the village, on the farms they till. The outermost lands are not more than four miles from the village, which is in a better condition than is common.

Reallotments of land have been frequent in Russia, but this transfer of land from one farmer to another, or from a father to his eldest son, has not taken into account the young men who have grown up in Russia's rapidly increasing population. Kluchie had an entirely new and complete redistribution of the available land two days before we came there. The lands are now divided into good and bad, and each peasant has been given three strips of land in each, one of which must lie fallow each year. But nothing is said about fertilizing the land, and Russia not only does not use nightsoil, the source of the Chinese farmer's wealth, but he even ignores the value of animal manures. The manager of the Count's estate uses all the manure from his large stables on the land. Under the present distribution of land in Kluchie, each male over 21 has 16½ acres.

In Petrograd and Moscow, while we were there, the political tendency was away from the revolutionary toward the conservative. Disorganization under the new régime and inability on the part of the laborers to earn good profits without managers, were leading the people, under the pinch of hunger, to a more conservative stand on the relations of capital and labor. But in the black earth district, where there is plenty

Our train started promptly and abruptly an hour late and carried us back one hundred miles in fifteen hours. Our hunt for the unspoiled peasant had taken the best part of three days. We had stayed in one hospitable home, whose simple charm justified all the time and trouble, and had ridden far across wide open prairie in a tiny earriage wide enough for one.

It was on the trip out that a thoughtless act of mine made the two Russians in our party fear mobbing or massacre. Seeing five big horses pulling one tiny plow, I hopped from the earriage and ran to get a picture of it. Of course the boy plowman and the girl driver misunderstood my purpose and, abandoning their team, they fled. The boy was soon coaxed back and placated with a few apples, but for all I know the little girl is running yet.

We stopped for a minute at the tiny hut of a woman with five small children. Her husband is at the war. Two rooms there were, with an oven and a box cradle for the thin-legged baby in one. The other room was closed. The woman was having a hard fight of it, but was by no means disconsolate. War has hit these peasant villages hard. The commune of Bolanda has sent two thousand men out of a total population of thirteen thousand and the communal district of Kluchie has contributed three hundred out of two thousand men, women and children. The peasant women are extending their already broad sphere of Kerensky, at the front, listening to a soldiers' spokesman who has climbed into the Premier's automobile. The gray mass in the background is the mass of men for whom the speaker spoke of food for all, opinion on the land question is growing more radical as time passes. Food is good and sufficient in the farming villages, and at one mill we saw as much grain coming in as the mill could grind. White bread can be had in Bolanda for forty kopeks a pound, which is at present no higher than the cost in some parts of America; but in Saratov, a hundred miles away, not even gray bread can be bought, sour black bread being the only kind available.

duties, and things are moving along as well as one can expect.

The Russian peasant runs a good deal to beard and hair and too little to brains and steady industry. Throughout the long winter he loafs, without being able to read or utilize his time to advantage. Numerically, he is a tremendous factor. Politically, much depends on the leaders he follows to ruin, or to the happy lot that the husbandman deserves.

THE historic home of the Moody Church, Chicago, formerly known as the Chicago Avenue Church, has been sold to the Moody Bible Institute, together with the adjoining Young People's Building and the ground on which the two structures stand.

There has seldom been a more important transaction of the sort, viewed as to its significance for the proclamation of the Gospel. The Moody Church, always aggressively evangelistic, still shot through with the purpose of the man who, there, first upheld the cross of the redeeming Christ, was compelled to seek larger quarters over two years ago, and erected a tabernacle of 5,000 seating capacity a mile north of its old location. On the other hand, the Moody Bible Institute, crowded with earnest young people seeking training for all branches of Christian work, has long been urgently in need of increased class-room facilities, and especially a large auditorium for public conferences.

Hence this famous church structure, the scene of unceasing revival, will witness hereafter the training of thousands of young men and women for the service of the cross in all lands, while continuing as a rallying-point for Christian leaders the world over. Of a truth, Dwight L. Moody's works do follow him.

Contrary to the general impression, these two Chicago organizations, founded by the great evangelist, are separate, independent institutions. The prevalent belief that they are two branches of a single organization has worked inconvenience in many instances to both, as well as to the Christian public. Hence the need for emphasizing the fact that the Moody Church, pursuing its God-given ministry as a congregation of believers, has no organic connection whatever with the Moody Bible Institute, raised up of God to send forth trained Gospel workers into all the world. The methods of the two are different, the control is different, the appeal is different.

The church is undenominational, but the Institute is strongly inter-denominational, as represented in its trustees, its faculty, its student body, the character of its curriculum, and its basis of financial support. All the churches and all the mission boards appeal to it for helpers; it is glad to be able to respond to all, and its students are fighting sin and disease and ignorance and wickedness in every corner of the world under almost every organization that sends workers to the field.

The host of friends and former co-workers of D. L. Moody around the world will rejoice to learn that the purchase of this sanctuary of sacred memory signalizes, in many important respects, a new stage in the growth and development of the Moody Bible Institute.

This great institution is the largest of its kind in the world, with property assets now exceeding $1,500,000. Its total enrollment in all departments has passed 25,000. There are at present over 1,100 students in attendance at the day and evening classes, and more than 3,500 are scattered throughout the world. The Moody Bible Institute has made plans for four additional buildings besides the church—a men's dormitory, a women's dormitory, a dormitory for married students, and an administration building. It has also enlarged its provision for missionary preparation by the addition of special missionary courses, and now has in operation a literal "training camp" for volunteers for home and foreign missions, on a scale perhaps not fully duplicated in any other school in the world.

President Admonishes Army and Navy to Observe Sabbath

THE WHITE HOUSE.
Washington, 20 Jan., 1918.

The President, commander in chief of the Army and Navy, following the reverent example of his predecessors, desires and enjoins the orderly observance of the Sabbath by the officers and men in the military and naval service of the United States. The importance for man and beast of the prescribed weekly rest, the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors, a becoming deference to the best sentiment of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine Will demand that Sunday labor in the Army and Navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity. Such an observance of Sunday is dictated by the best traditions of our people and by the convictions of all who look to Divine Providence for guidance and protection, and, in repeating in this order the language of President Lincoln, the President is confident that he is speaking alike to the hearts and to the consciences of those under his authority.

THE FINEST SYMPATHY

A SERMON

By
REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Rom. 12:15 "Rejoice with them that do rejoice"

REJOICE with them that do rejoice." But is not this most gratuitous counsel? Is it needful for the apostle to write in this wise to professed Christians? Surely the very fact that they are Christians implies that their sympathies are rich and ample, stretching across the whole field of man's complex life! And yet it is true today, as in the days of the apostle, that there are many Christians whose sympathies are poverty-stricken and scanty. No mourner would ever dream of going to them for sympathetic tears; no child would ever leap toward them for sympathetic joy.

There is a type of piety which is hard, and dry, and severe; it has no gracious tears, it never breaks into winning smiles; it neither laughs nor cries; it is unresponsive. And this type of piety is always in peril of growing harder with the years. It shrinks and becomes more and more exclusive, more and more self-centered, more and more self-contained. The few feelers which it originally possessed are drawn in one by one, or they become benumbed and atrophied; and in later years the entire life is lived in most unbeautiful detachment.

From that perverse and perverting piety may the good Lord deliver us! And, therefore, I think the counsel of the text is as opportune in modern life as to the men and women to whom it was primarily given. "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep."

NOW, in the Christian life, joy has, perhaps, been much under-emphasized in comparison with the ministry of sorrow. And I think this under-emphasis has been attended by perilous and destructive results. We speak of the consolidating influence of sorrow, and we do well. Everybody knows how lives that have been dismembered by prosperity are brought together again by the ministry of grief. Sundered brothers have been united again at their father's grave. The simultaneous passage through a common grief begets influences of gracious cohesion. But while we speak this way of sorrow we are not as prone to make a similar claim for joy. And yet is there anything more possessed of uniting and healing energy than a pure and abounding joy?

In the old coaching days, men's lips were often sealed on the freezing journey, but they were loosed again by the warmth and cheer of the glowing fire. And so it is with the radiant, glowing ministries in human life: a fine joy breaks up the severing silences of men, and binds them together in gracious intercourse.

And then again we are all agreed about the consecrating ministry of sorrow, but I do not think we are quite as agreed that a similar consecration belongs to joy. Horace Greeley once said that while joy may elevate, sorrow alone can consecrate. I cannot accept the antithesis. I am perfectly sure the power of the Holy Ghost is in all pure joy, converting it into a minister of sanctification. In some of our hospitals use is made of medicated beams, and particular rays of light are brought to bear upon particular disease. But, while these medicated beams are the ministers of health, we must not forget the health-giving ministry of the natural beams of the sun. And so it is with joy. When our grief passes, the season of consecration is not ended. It continues when the joy begins, and "the joy of the Lord may be our strength!" I think these disparaging comparisons are not true, and I am sure it will be well for us to believe more and more in the marvelous powers of pure and undefiled delight.

NOW, joy sympathy is of finer substance than sorrow sympathy. There are many who are touched by another's sorrows who are quite unmoved by his joys. They can "cloud over" at the story of his grief; they do not shine at the recital of his triumphs. They can play at funerals; they have no taste for weddings. They can moan, but they cannot sing. Their joy-bell is very rusty and creaky, while their passing-bell is in excellent order.

All this means that the joy in human life is enormously impoverished. We do not go out of ourselves; we stay too much at home. We have no splendid correspondences with our fellows, and we do not warm ourselves at their fires. We just dig down into our own hearts for our joy, or we cultivate a little garden patch of our own affairs, and we don't seek our delight in a wider public good. Our quest is confined to self, and does not cover our brother. And so our joy is not "full."

NOW, according to the apostle Paul, we are to seek much of our joys in the joys of other people. And therefore everybody has a spacious gathering-ground. We are to "rejoice with them that do rejoice." Let us just glance at some of these joys which it is to be our privileged lot to share.

First of all, it is perfectly certain that when the apostle speaks of rejoicing with them that do rejoice, he is thinking primarily of those who are rejoicing because of their spiritual emancipation. Once imprisoned in the darkness, they are now living in the glad some light of spiritual freedom. Once held under the tyranny of the devil, they are exulting in the franchises of the kingdom of our God. And we are to send out our spiritual feelers into the lives of these free-born men, and we are to discern their joys and share in the rejoicing.*

In the Church at Rome there would be many a Roman slave who had been regarded as a mere chattel, having little or no individual worth, possessed of none of the dignities of true manhood, and starved by the severance of all fine and large relationships. And there comes to such a man the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and it speaks to him as it speaks to the rich, making no distinction of persons. It tells him he is a son, of infinite worth to the eternal God, one for whom the Saviour died!

And there would surely be many a Roman patrician, who had long been imprisoned in the pomp and vanity of the world, and whose soul was weary in the staleness of the feast, and who had found emancipation in the light and power of redeeming grace. And such men would stretch their souls, and soar, and sing as they moved forward, possessed by a new-found joy. And with these the little Church was called upon to rejoice! And how many a Roman soldier, who had been held in the bondage of mere materialism, and who had known nothing but the brutality of naked strength, would be lifted up into the experience of new powers, even into the gales of the Holy Spirit! In all these many and varied lives joy would be born, and by a fine sympathy others were to share in it.

WELL, now, here is a vast province from which to gather our delights, but to many of us it is an unknown territory. On every side there is the joy of jubilee—ransomed sinners returning home in everlasting joy—and we don't slay it. But altogether apart from these purely spiritual realms there are countless other joys born in the lives of other people, joys which are intended by our God to be reservoirs of common delight. New ties are created, bringing into a life new life and new rejoicing, and in that new-found relationship we are all expected to have a part. One man has succeeded in his task, and he is radiant in his day of prosperity. And Christian folk are to sit down at that man's feast and participate in his triumph.

A little while ago a very powerful sermon was preached, and after it was over somebody whispered, speaking of a fellow minister, "Did you see So-and-so's face? He looked as delighted as though he had preached the sermon himself!" That is the spirit to covet! It finds a well in another man's success; it finds fountains in everybody's joys. "Rejoice with them that do rejoice."

NOW, the range of our joy depends upon the quality of our souls. The fineness of our sensitiveness determines the area of our correspondences. How much fine, sensitive surface do we present to the world? That is the critical test. Our sensitiveness is apt to decrease with the increase of our years. When we reach the age of forty we are in danger of losing sympathy with the joys of young people who are still twenty, and when we advance to sixty we are in peril of losing touch with the folk who are still at forty.

There is nothing more glorious than to find an old man in the possession of a full-orbed sensitiveness, in quick correspondence with all the joys that vibrate in the full range of human life. I had such a man in my church, who for many years filled with gracious dignity the office of senior deacon. He thrilled to the joys of childhood, to the aspirations of youth, as well as to the quieter delights of the aged. Every joyful vibration from any part of the great field of human life found a sensitive surface in this man's gloriously sensitive life. How can we obtain and retain a similar sensitiveness of soul?

Well, let us remember that the injunctions of this twelfth chapter of Romans succeed the teachings of the sixth and eighth chapters. The apostle Paul would never have put these counsels at the beginning of this Epistle in the form of antecedents; they come at the end in the form of consequents. In the great fifth chapter he has unfolded the doctrine of justification, the sublime means by which men become right with God. And in the eighth chapter he has described the ministry of the Holy Spirit, the sublime means by which men are kept right with God.

If a man enters into the reality of these two chapters he will acquire that responsiveness of spirit which will enable him to discharge the duties of the twelfth.

DAILY MEDITATION

Reverend
E. W. Caswell
and
Prof. W. H. T. Dau

Doing the Impossible

SUNDAY, February 10. Mark 3:5. "Stretch forth thy hand." That was the one thing he couldn't do! And he was asked to do it! Christ named his great incapacity and demanded the impossible. For years and years the shrunken, shriveled thing had hung helplessly at his side, a poor mockery of a hand. "Stretch forth thy hand!" Impossible! But he did it! "And his hand was made whole like unto the other."

And that is to be the Christian's distinction. "What do ye more than others!" We are not to walk in the average ranks; we are to march in the van. We are to triumphantly beat the average.

And harder things than these we have to do. We are to go to lives where hearts are like flint, and we are to melt them with the ministry of light. Impossible! Yes, we are to win great battles, and we are to have no other equipment than "the armor of light." We are to overturn mighty strongholds with the forces of the spirit. Impossible! "Things that are not are to bring to nought things that are." Such is to be the Christian's distinction. We are to march beyond the stern borders of the possible and set our feet in impossible lands.

Our Lord commands it. What is the secret of the achievement? This is the secret; his commandments are always the pledge of the needful endowments. The blind man obeys his Master, and goes forth to find his sight in the pool of Siloam. How impossible! Yes, but he went, and Christ's holy power went with him, and he came back seeing. The cure was not in Siloam, but in the journey; not in the mineral spring, but in the obedience. "As he went he received his sight." At Christ's bidding faith sets out on the most astounding errands, "and laughs at impossibilities," and cries, "It shall be done!" J. H. J.

"Safety First"

MONDAY, February 11. Matt. 16:24. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself." These words of Jesus do not mean occasional acts of self-denial, temporary fasts, self-imposed moments of hardship. They mean a total repudiation of self as the object of love, an unconditional surrender of self as the first object of consideration. So, no Christian can ever adopt the maxim, "Take care of Number One"—unless he makes Christ Number One. "Safety First" may be a very good motto if only we define safety right. Whose safety? Certainly not ours. The safety of society, the safety of others, the safety of the kingdom of God. He who puts anything else first is reversing the Christian order.

Is it possible to modify the tendency of human nature so as to set up another personality than our own as "Number One"? Of course it is possible. When a man marries, if he have a worthy idea of marriage, he shifts his loyalty from his own personality to that of another. Every mother knows this experience. The whole philosophy of selfishness is shattered by the first sight of a baby's face, nay, by the first thought of the little life, so helpless, so dependent, yet so divine.

This is the program of the Christian life: Self dethroned, Christ enthroned, and then the adoption by us of Christ's own standard of values. We must care for the things he cared for. We must make supreme the things which he made supreme.

Abraham Lincoln

TUESDAY, February 12. Luke 12:50. "I have a baptism to be baptized with." Abraham Lincoln faced his baptism of suffering with a heroism like that of his Lord. He endured his Gethsemane of struggle pressed down under the weight of a nation's woe. He drank the cup of calumny to its dregs. He was acquainted with grief, as battle after battle went against the Union, often crying out in defeat, "O God, what will the country say!" When he smiled, it was to keep from crying.

He could not be hid; he must become the leader of the nation, the emancipator of a race. Himself he could not save; his work was to save others. His martyrdom shed a light over the world like a reflection from Calvary. His soul was open to the Infinite; he lived in the realm of revelations. His dreams were angelic visits of inspiration; his visions were of the Lord, high and lifted up; he saw his country could not remain half slave and half free; that a house divided could not stand. He felt he was called of God to strike off the chains of slavery and let the captives go free. Once he remarked to a company of visitors, "Keep praying and I will keep fighting."

Lincoln had measureless tenderness for the masses of men. He felt the pulsations of millions of troubled hearts throbbing against his own noble manhood. He was a heroic reformer long before he became President and closed a temperance address in 1842 with these eloquent words: "And when the victory shall be complete—when there shall be neither a slave nor a drunkard on the earth—how proud the title of that land which may claim to be the birthplace and the cradle of both these revolutions that shall have ended in victory. Glorious consummation! Hail, fall of Fury! Reign of Reason, all hail!" E. W. C.

In the House of His Friends

WEDNESDAY, February 13. Zech. 13:6. "And one shall say unto him, What are these wounds in thine hands? Then he shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends." We prefer to adhere to the old interpretation by which this text is connected with the next verse and both referred to the suffering Christ. It is true that the majority of the Jewish nation can hardly be said to have treated Christ as a friend. But it is equally certain that Christ came to the Jews as a friend. He himself was a Jew. He declared that "salvation is of the Jews." The Jews were the old covenant race of God, among whom Jehovah had his fire and furnace. They were Christ's own people. He came to his own, and they received him not, but smote him, and he did die in the house of his friends.

Not to excite hatred against the Jews, or to revive the old spirit of persecution of their race, but for the purpose of applying the sad truth contained in this text to ourselves, we have called attention to it. Is not Christ made to suffer still in the house of his friends? Pagans commit their idolatry and all sorts of wickedness while ignorant of Christ, his work and his teaching. But worse than heathen are those people who profess to believe in Christ, who honor him with their lips and call themselves by his name, and yet do him dishonor by their lives. Plain crimes even have been committed in the name of Christ and under pretense of furthering his cause. As in the days of Zechariah the Lord may still utter the complaint and raise the accusation: "These are the wounds with which I was wounded in the house of my friends." W. H. T. D.

The Engrafted Word

THURSDAY, February 14. James 1:21. "Wherefore, lay apart all filthiness . . . and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls." James Moffatt's "New Translation of the New Testament" gives us a striking paraphrase of these words: "So, clear away all the foul rank growth of malice, and make a soil of modesty for the Word which roots itself inwardly with power to save your souls." It is a difficult world in which to keep clean. The tendency of unspiritual humanity is to corrupt speech and conduct. James has much to say about the misuse of speech, about the sins of the untamed tongue. He knew the habits of his age, the mental and moral decadence of his times, and so he exhorted Christians, "Lay aside all filthiness and abounding iniquity—lay it aside."

The symbol is not what it appears to be, laying off a soiled garment, but rather the ridding of a garden plot of noxious weeds. The foul rank growth being cast out, then follows the implanting, the engrafting of the Word. The process of grafting in horticulture is most interesting. A seedling bearing only tasteless or bitter fruit is transformed into a valuable tree by the grafting process. A tree can not be improved by a graft from one of its own kind. It must be lifted above its own life by something taken from a higher life. So human sin demands a divine Saviour. We need more than a man-made gospel. God sent his Son into the world, the Incarnate Word, to give life to a dead race. But we must receive the Word. Salvation is, from the first to the last, a matter of receiving God's gift. C. C. A.

Out Into the Night

FRIDAY, February 15. John 13:30. "And it was night." Many commentators have been struck with the abrupt manner in which John closes his account of the episode with the traitor Judas on the night of our Lord's last Passover celebration. They have felt that this remark is not added only to show that Judas could not have gone to make any purchases, for the shops were closed at that time. "There is certainly something awful in this termination, and its brevity makes it all the more impressive. The event had so deeply engraven itself on the mind of John that he remembered the hour." This brief remark of John may indicate to us the tragedy that was being enacted in the soul of Judas. The perfidy which he was about to commit did not bear the light. It was a deed of darkness. But Judas himself had reason to shun the light, especially Him who was himself the Light that lighteth up the whole world.

It was a memorable occasion, that last night which our Lord spent upon the earth. John has filled four chapters of his Gospel with the account of the parting discourse of our Lord. The heart of Jesus was overflowing with love for the little band of his disciples. He gave them his last instructions, administered his last warnings to them, but above all he spoke comfort to them as he had done on no previous occasion. His discourse was drawn out till midnight. The room where they were was bathed in heavenly light because of his teaching. Judas could not bear this: on his soul the eternal night had settled. The whole scene was an accusation against his dark doings. He fled from life and joy and happiness; he had to go to relieve his guilty conscience somewhat. He went out into the night of misery, despair, death. The powers of darkness which held him in their clutch throttled him. He received his wages twice that night.

So others have quit the company of Jesus and his disciples; some actually drawn away by the same covetousness which had gripped greedy Judas, others enticed by lust in some other form. It has been night in every soul that has left Jesus and his light and love. Question: Would you go away from Jesus?

Equal to Opportunity

SATURDAY, February 16. Rev. 3:8. "Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." Opportunity is a mighty word for the youth of America. The rise of poor boys to the highest position in the gift of the nation was seen in the lives of our three assassinated Presidents, Lincoln, Garfield and McKinley. No young man of our land today meets with greater difficulties than these heroes overcame. A pine knot in a log cabin was their light for study; the towpath of the canal, ragged and barefooted, they journeyed; with little education, of humble parentage, they achieved wonderful distinction, making all their powers available to activity because they had been trained by adversity. Their own struggle with poverty excited a sympathy with toilers that made them one with the people.

Being the benefactors of their countrymen, they are forever embalmed in the affections of mankind, influencing all with their lives and principles. They had sensibility of soul, acuteness of mind and warmth of heart, making them accessible to all classes of people.

They did not assume high dignity, but exclaiming, "I am nothing, truth is everything," "God has a place and work for me and I am ready," they prayed the hymn,

"Guide me, O thou great Jehovah!"

Whoever was for the Wrong, they were for the Right, and Right was Might, for God is God. An unseen eye guided them; an invisible hand led them till heaven's portals opened to their early vision. One said, "I have faced death before and I am not afraid to meet him now." Another said, "Nearer, my God, to thee, nearer to thee." The world was still when they were borne to their last resting-places; the shots that killed them were the expiring blows of some lost cause, giving them immortal enthronement. E. W. C.

A Listening World

IN that wonderful passage, 1 Kings 19:9-12, frequently quoted yet little understood, there is a powerful reminder of conditions in Europe at the present time. The Scripture tells us how Elijah left his place of shelter, where he had hidden to escape the slayers, and while he stood before the Lord out in the open: "A great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still small voice."

Have we not some of these manifestations in present conditions in Europe? There have been great storms, involving all the nations, some disastrously, while millions of souls have lost their spiritual moorings and are drifting to ruin. There have been earthquakes social, political and economic, which have overturned rulers and governments, and caused universal upheaval among the peoples. And we have had and still have the fires of trial, suffering and privation. But the wind that rent the mountains, the mighty earthquake and the fire in Elijah's experience, were not essential parts of the Divine nature but ministers to the Divine will. They are forces which, if men would only interpret them rightly, should be regarded as monitors pointing us to righteousness.

There was a climax to Elijah's phenomenal visitation. He had looked for God in the midst of the tumult, but failed to find Him, and it was not until the fire had done its work that the prophet heard the "still small voice."

Christian people should pray that Europe, which is now passing through a fiery trial, may be quick to hear the "still small voice" when it speaks and be ready to obey. It would almost seem that the workers of Russia, England, Austria and Germany have already heard that Voice, and that Labor—the great burden-bearer of the world—may yet be chosen to lead the nations out of the war-storm with all its hatred, its frightfulness and its sin, back to God and righteousness and peace.

February, Month of Heroes

FEBRUARY is a cold and a bitterly short month. But despite its disagreeable features, one always thinks of February with a very real sense of pleasure. For it stands out on our calendar as a month of heroes.

It was in February that a boy was born in a stately Southern manor house—a boy who was destined to mold the fate of a nation in his strong, capable hands—a boy who was destined to lead a country away from kings and kingly power and kingly greed to a form of government that would be by and for the people.

And it was in February, perhaps a century later, that another boy was born in a Middle Western log cabin—a boy whose hands were the tender though toil-worn hands that later bound up the bleeding wounds of the same nation and brought the dream of peace and brotherhood to its troubled soul.

February—the month of heroes! Washington and Lincoln are figures that live in the hearts of every patriot—Washington with his courtly grace; Lincoln with his dear, homely features and his understanding smile. And because of its association with them, February, despite its cold weather, its dark nights and its snowy dawns, will always be known and loved and looked forward to as the bravest month of all.

The Worth of Sympathy

IF ever there was a time when misery, want, sorrow and heart-breaking were rampant, it is now. Wherever one casts his eye, be it to the western battlefield with its countless dead, maimed and wounded; to the lonely homes deprived of a father's, a brother's, a husband's or sweetheart's care and providing; to the huts and palaces where actual want is found; to the poor and sorely pressed; to the homeless in great conflagrations, in tempests, and earthquakes; to the tens of thousands torn by conflicting claims of old and new fatherlands; to the misunderstood and misjudged—everywhere there seems to be cause for tears, for sorrow, for misery of mind and body. Everywhere are multitudes carrying heavy loads.

What an invitation in this to all of us to help carry these loads! Pressed and disturbed as we may be ourselves, cause enough as we may have for individual complaint, someone else has the heavier load, and it is incumbent upon us to help carry it.

"Sympathy," says Charles H. Parkhurst, "is two hearts tugging at one load." This is a good idea, for "a brother's suffering claims a brother's pity." In Christ we have the great example of One who watched and wept and prayed and felt for all. If we would be his followers, we must follow in his steps. Our money is needed for Red Cross work, for relief funds, for institutions of mercy; our sacrifices as to food, fuel, clothing and other things will go a long way toward giving these commodities to those more in need of them than we are ourselves; our prayers for the afflicted, the sorrowing, the oppressed and destitute, will set in motion a wave of sympathy which is sorely needed; our individual endeavors and collective sympathies will help to bring about that state of conditions for which the world at large is sighing.

Have we distress near at home? Do we know a lonesome, worrying mother with a son "over there"? Do we know of a young wife, a sister, a daughter, who fears to take up the morning paper because of what it might bring? To all such, a visit, a clasp of the hand, a cheering smile, a kind word, how much they will help! Let us come together in sympathy and express it fully and freely in thought, word and act, to alleviate as much as we may of the sorrows, the trials and the troubles of those with whom we come in contact or of whom we know and hear. And let us remember that

"The Sympathy we give today
We may be glad to get to-morrow."

Why Your Paper Is Still Late

EVERY week brings nearer the restoration of normal mailing facilities, when Christian Herald subscribers can depend upon receiving their paper regularly on time. The widespread congestion of railway traffic of all kinds has been hard on periodicals throughout the whole country. We have reason to hope, however, that the worst is well over, and that the energetic measures adopted by the government will render impossible any repetition of such delays as those of the first week in January, when all the mails, except first-class matter, became hopelessly congested not only at the starting point but at all big terminals. Our readers will understand that the government, at that particular time, was dealing with unprecedented conditions which, as the President explained, "called for many sacrifices," in order that still greater sacrifices might be averted. We will ask our readers to kindly accept this as our reply to the complaints we have received, every one of which is attributable to the causes mentioned above, which as we previously explained are wholly outside of the publishers' control.

Discussing the Church "After the War"

MANY thousands of earnest Christian men and women throughout this land are now giving thoughtful consideration to the problem involved in the discussion of "The Church After the War." Every mail brings us letters on the subject, some containing practical suggestions and all showing a deep interest. A reader of the Christian Herald in Norfolk, Va., sends this communication:

In line with your "After the War" comments on the Church, I would suggest the following as most needful improvements on the present conditions:

A proper distribution of the churches by eliminating denominational rivalry, and doing away with surplus churches on the various four corners where one church would accommodate all the people tributary thereto, and by wisely distributing the ministers among vacant fields to carry the Gospel to fields now neglected, or, more concisely, to introduce business management.

Feed the children on the Bible, and the promise is "My Word shall not return unto me void." "The child is father to the man," and this generation of young people, instructed in God's Word, will surely secure to the next a God-fearing and church-going people.

Utilize all the lay members, and thus multiply the forces warring against sin. Nearly every church has numbers of devout and well qualified members, who are only waiting to be used in vacant fields near by. The Saviour sent out the seventy. Let us adopt his methods.

These views deserve consideration because they are practical and such as can be readily applied even in a small community. But the problem is so vast that the method used must be broad and far-reaching and adaptable to all conditions. Nor should it be forgotten that Church unification is not to be achieved by the larger absorbing the smaller bodies. That would, in effect, be establishing the principle that the greater is necessarily the better—that the larger should absorb the smaller. Such, however, cannot be the true ideal of spiritual unity, which depends not on organization nor yet upon numbers, but upon the spiritual life and purpose of each and every member of the whole, and upon the unselfish consecration which is ready to waive all denominational advantage, that good may come to all. In other words, there can be no real union where all are not equally ready and willing to sacrifice for union's sake.

The path of Christianity is one which puts all who walk upon it on a common plane of equality. There can be no real union without recognizing this principle. It is only when all are at one on the essentials, and knit together in that spiritual brotherhood which marks the true discipleship, that they can ever look forward to the day when the Christian Church can be truthfully called "one flock with one Shepherd." That day, we believe, will come, but in God's good time; and when it does come, the whole Church will flow together in bonds of love and service. Meanwhile, it is for us to look forward and prepare for it.

Thoroughness

"THIS one thing I do," wrote the apostle to the Gentiles. It is a philosophy of successful achievement, good for all of us.

Dwight L. Moody wrote of a certain mission: "I have done one thing on this trip, and the work is wonderful. One thing is my motto." Of such projects as Moody was accustomed to undertake one at a time was quite enough for any one man. And such a man as Moody, all there, was equal to any undertaking.

Edison says his life motto has been, "I know only one thing—electricity." It has proved enough to keep him busy and crown his life with achievement. And he has not exhausted the subject yet, nor has the subject exhausted him. Edison and electricity are two names that will be linked together throughout the ages.

The thorough men are the solid foundation stones of any enterprise. The listless ones whose time and attention are divided up among many things at the same time are poor material. They get nowhere in the long run. They may seem bright and swift as did the fabled hare, while the thorough, painstaking ones may seem slow and plodding as did the tortoise of the same fable; but the point of the fable is that the tortoise won the race. And that is the point in life.

Thoroughness can't be attained by sticking a ramrod through the vertebrae. The right kind of backbone stiffening comes from above. A high ideal is the strongest lure. Love of one's work can be developed by purpose in it, earnest application to it and mastery of it. And he who loves his work will be thorough in it. He loves it not for what he can get out of it but for what he can put into it. Here is one of the lines that divide the animal from the human; and there is a higher line, marked by nobility of purpose and thoroughness of endeavor, which divides the mere human from the regenerate man and woman.

The Man and His Calling

A HANDSOME marble shaft has been raised to the memory of a Pennsylvanian, bearing the inscription, "Here Lies a Great Merchant." Possibly it is not the best that could be said of him. It is something, but it does not seem to be enough for the record of a life. We live not merely to buy and sell goods, but to be an influence among human forces. The man must not disappear in his calling. One's vocation often swallows him, completely overwhelms him, and there is nothing left of him for any purpose outside his occupation.

It is a contemptible estimate of a vocation to regard it as merely a means of getting a living. The man who is not greater than his calling, who does not overtop his vocation, so that the manhood runs over all sides, is sadly deficient. A man should be greater than the business he builds up, greater than any speech he makes or book he writes, than any house he builds or any sermon he preaches.

It is good to be a great merchant, a great professor, a great farmer or statesman or doctor. But it is far better to be great in manhood. No man can be truly of use to his community until he outgrows the vocation that gives him bread and butter. No man is really rich who is not greater than his check-book.

A Day at Camp Upton

FOR some time I had been anxious to visit one of the camps that are housing the young men who are to fight America's war. There were many reasons why I wanted to do this.

There was the miracle of putting up practically over night wooden cities able to house thousands upon thousands of men; to give them the material comforts to which the twentieth century had accustomed them; to guard them against the dangers of unsanitary conditions; to protect them from the inclemencies of impending winter.

Then there was the question, How do these young men find their life, taken away from the happy routine of home and placed in conditions so novel and extraordinary? Do they find themselves quickly, do they take hold readily, do they come to feel at home and happy? For after all, it is more interesting to know how people live in their heart and mind than in their body. And in that connection I wanted to know whether Christ had gone along to camp, and whether there was room for him amid the preparation for war.

So, one Tuesday evening, I called up our camp pastor at Camp Upton and asked him whether he were going to camp the next day. And when he said yes, I asked to go along.

On the trip out we discussed the task which the war has placed upon our churches. Many thousands of their young men in the army, many already across the sea and all of them needing now the backing of their home church more than ever before in their life. We realized the truth of that prayer in this crisis: "God give us men, great men, men that can lead."

AFTER an hour and a half, we drew up at the station and alighted. We were not in the camp, but a brisk walk of ten minutes through the snow brought us to the edge of "the miracle city," Camp Upton, which houses 35,000 of our soldier boys and will soon have 20,000 more. Over 400 unpainted, two-story barracks, each housing about 120 men, form the living and sleeping quarters. In addition, numberless buildings are about, serving as store and supply houses, guard houses, and Y. M. C. A. quarters.

Each barrack is supplied with running water and electric light, the latter supplied by a large central plant. The barracks are heated by tremendous wood-burning stoves. An aisle divides them in the center, on one side being the mess-room, on the other the sleeping quarters. For comfort, convenience and simple order they are, indeed, first rate.

My mentor had to see a young man in the baking a camp can fail to be struck by the inviting appearance of the Y. M. C. A. huts, their attractive coloring, their curtained windows and signs of welcome. Into that equipment, which the closest study has standardized and perfected, has gone the finest manhood of America to make the work of the Y. M. C. A. effective. I knew what stood in back of that equipment at Camp Upton. I had seen the tremendous store-house on West Twenty-third Street, New York City. I had seen also the building of the International, and spoken with the men who are mobilizing the man-power of America to help the Y. M. C. A. I had begun to understand the secret of the Y. M. C. A.'s success. It was the ability to tackle a man's job in a man's way, directly, forcibly, successfully. Or, as one of the Gary bankers once told me when I visited his city to study the Gary system, "We tried to do the obvious thing without red tape, or fear for outworn tradition."

I fully "doing the obvious thing" of bringing the home and home surroundings to the camp and to the front, the Y. M. C. A. is rendering a real service. The way the men frequent its buildings and speak of its work shows how thoroughly it is succeeding.

Unfortunately, the churches are not moving as rapidly and smoothly. The Knights of Columbus building was erected and in service, taking care of the Catholic boys, but the Protestant chapel stood unfinished, no roof, the sides only partly boarded, though it ought to have been in service many weeks previous. The church must learn from the Y. M. C. A., and since its job in this crisis is a man's job, it must measure up and do it in a man's way.

It is a man's job to help these young men keep their spiritual balance, to bring Christ into camp and to keep him there. That's the task for the Christian church, which overshadows every other at present. Much has been done, and every Christian heart at home should vibrate in response to the call, so that the church's task may be done as thoroughly as the occasion and opportunity demand.

O. H. P.

Camp Upton, Yaphank, L. I., where National Army men from New York City are preparing for France squad. He was the son of wealthy parents and had always enjoyed the comforts of a well-appointed home, but he did not at all regret being thrown into the sterner necessities of army life. He took us through the camp bakery which each day turns out 20,000 to 40,000 two-pound loaves of bread. In every detail it was a model of cleanliness and convenience.

BEING in camp, it was natural that we should drop in at the Y. M. C. A., "the home that goes along with the men to the front," as has been so often said. In Camp Upton there are eight Y. M. C. A. huts, each containing a large auditorium arranged for lectures, services, entertainments and motion-picture evenings. Then it contains a lounging and reading-room, a desk for information and service, and quarters for the secretaries. In addition, each camp has a general headquarters building, with its staff of directors, which plans and initiates the work in the various camps. The Y. M. C. A. is "on the job." It's on the job in equipment and man-power. No one entering BOYS from the North, boys from the South, East, West—all over the country, assembled in the great Southern training camps and stations. Boys who have traveled—boys who have never been out of their state before. All of them open to impressions; sensitive; responsive to public opinion. Think what would happen if the old idea of the "ruff-tuff" army man were allowed to prevail. But fortunately it isn't. These Southern people have taken the boys to their hearts. Representatives of the War Camp Community Service (a branch of the War Department Commission on Training Camp Activities) have gone into the communities and awakened the people to the need for providing wholesome recreation for the enlisted men's leisure hours, organized the local forces and stayed to direct and systematize the work. The communities are almost without exception bringing all their facilities into play, opening new club rooms, writing-rooms and community meeting-places. This is splendid. But what is better—what is best of all—is that they are taking the boys into their own homes, entertaining them at dinner, letting them have hot baths and making them part of the family.

It is quite a liberal education too for the Northern boys to come into contact with Southern life. One of the War Camp Community workers writes: "I accompanied a group of soldiers to — yesterday, where they were entertained at dinner. After dinner we spent the time in exploring the large plantation which was handed down from slavery days to the family now occupying it. In the evening all the colored folk on the plantation assembled at the home of the owner and entertained the soldier visitors with negro folk songs."

A most decided change of feeling has been brought about in one small Southern city during the last few months. For years marines have been stationed on an island not far out, but there has been practically no intercourse between the men and the townspeople. It never occurred to the townspeople that these boys might be lonely and hungry for some bit of normal life. The Commission on Training Camp Activities asked the Playground and Recreation Association to send its representative into the communities near the camps to help the people see their responsibility and organize them for furnishing normal happy recreation for the leisure hours of the men in the service. After a time plans were under way. A clubhouse for men on leave was provided—simple but permeated with a friendly spirit. The men came and were entertained with a good old-fashioned social and things to eat made in home kitchens. Those men went back to camp filled with enthusiastic tales. Their hosts went home to dream of their happy faces. The officers' skepticism changed to frank interest when they saw what could be done. Now, the men are coming to town in goodly numbers in their spare time. They are attending the club and the church parties—and on Sundays they go to the church services too.

THAT the work of the War Recreation Board in Des Moines, Ia., is appreciated by parents of boys at Camp Dodge is evidenced by a letter from a mother who writes to the official city hostess for the board:

"I wish I might make you realize how grateful we all are to you for your kind interest in our boy. His last few letters have had a different ring and I'm sure you are largely responsible for it. The home touch surely counts for a lot with most of us. While we felt that — was pretty level-headed, still the terrible things we are forced to believe scare us. You who live near the camps have wonderful opportunities as well as great responsibilities with our boys and your own girls, but this surely is a time when we all have a chance of finding out what we can do.

The following is taken from a letter written to one of the workers at Spartanburg, S. C., who has been helping to entertain soldiers:

"How can I thank you for being so good to my boy? He has been writing to me of your wonderful kindness to him, and I have felt that I should like to write to you, so I appreciate very much your writing to me, thus giving me an opportunity to do so. It means so much to me to know that some one is taking an interest in him down there. There is so little that we can do for him from home, and I don't dare write to him all the longing, loneliness and love I feel for him for fear it will make him homesick, but I feel that you are giving him so much that helps that over and over again I thank you."

"One of the finest things that Miss McMakin" (who had been leading the Community Chorus) "has done for Camp Wadsworth" says a recent letter "is to teach the boys that have attended her concerts the following words for 'Taps':

God of Love,	Friends and Home
God of Peace,	Bless us all,
God of Love,	Keep us each
God of Light,	Evermore."

"These words, when sung slowly and with expression, afford a dramatic finale to any program for soldiers; and on every future occasion when they hear 'Taps' they will think of them."

HOWARD CHASE

By PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON

HOWARD had been going down on the street during the two Saturdays since he arrived at Red Hill. He loved a crowd. He had mixed eagerly with the farmers, being introduced to them by his own church members as he met them. And with that attraction which men like the Expressman felt without being able to define it, he had drawn men to him. There was an irresistible charm in his ready grin, in his complete absence of ministerial manner, in his complete and absolute love of humanity and passion for democracy. Is it any wonder poor Inez bent to him as if a breath from some invisible zephyr had dropped over her and bent her frail blossom to nod trembling as he passed her? Results that with others required weeks and months for ripening were with him accomplished with swift hastening steps. He acted on people as a tonic and created friendship with a passing smile, making important history with amazing rapidity.

But this Saturday before the Sunday which was to begin the union evening services from which he began to anticipate some great results, he did not go down town, but spent the time between his little study and the churchyard.

His disfigured looks were, he told himself, partly to blame for his shrinking from the public. He said to himself with real honesty, the clear transparent sort which a man uses on himself as well as on other people, "I am, when you come to look at me, a fright. I can tell that the minute I catch sight of myself in a window-pane, to say nothing of a mirror. It is useless to deny I have always been a little proud of my looks. It is partly joy at being well and strong, but some of it is just pride, sheer pride, no matter what Rose says. I am beginning already to think of how I shall feel when I have to face the people tomorrow morning. It will be something of an ordeal. And I know it will be humiliating until I get to preaching, and perhaps even after that."

He had a number of details to attend to in connection with his services, and with the seating of the yard. While he was at work in his study in the forenoon Rose brought in the dodgers which Inez had sent over by one of the boys in the neighborhood who belonged to the Sunday school.

Howard at once invited him to go out on the street and distribute the circulars, getting some other boys to help, and also had him leave some at Deacon Burton's store to give out to his many farmer customers to take out to the farms with them. He called up Brother Noyes and asked him to call up Gray and Harris and ask them to take some part in the evening meeting, and then he shut himself into his little room to give his undivided thought to his morning sermon, which had for its theme, "Paul, the man of one idea."

WHEN he came out at one o'clock to get a little lunch, Rose gently rallied him on his looks.

"Honest, Howard, you do not look fit to go into the pulpit Sunday. Look at yourself in the glass and you'll see what the people will have to look at."

"I've stopped looking in the glass since the fire. You'll have to comb my hair for me. But I'm going into the pulpit tomorrow. It will be quite a shock to them, I know, but they'll get over it. Perhaps if I'm no better next Sunday I'll let Roy preach for me. Isn't it jolly to know he and Kate are coming?"

He spent the afternoon going over his sermon and helping to complete the final arrangements for his outdoor service. He had rearranged the seats so as to allow of more space in front of the lights out across the road so that people who came in their autos would feel they were more a part of the audience in the yard.

After supper he turned to Rose, who had gone into the kitchen for something.

"Now it's dark and I'm as good-looking as any one, I'll go over and see how Jake Seymour is. I'll not be out long."

SEYMOUR lived across the Santa Fe tracks on the other side of Red Hill. Howard had already been to see him to make inquiry about his injuries, but at the time of his call Jake had been asleep and the man who came to the door had said it was the doctor's orders not to excite him with company. Howard had learned that the man at the door was Seymour's brother and that the two lived together in the small house-keeping bachelor's quarters, Seymour's brother being a brakeman on the Santa Fe with a run to Newton, getting home at irregular intervals.

"As soon as he's able to see any one he'll want to see you, sure, Mr. Chase. Come again. If he's any worse I'll let you know."

Tonight when Howard knocked at the door the Agent opened it.

"Oh, it's you, Mr. Chase. Come in. Jake's getting on fine. He wants to see you."

Howard went in, seeing everything and seeming to see nothing. He found Jake Seymour sitting up, his head bandaged and a general air of being blown up about his person, but on the sure road to recovery and ready to express his thankfulness to Howard for his part on the night of the accident.

"I thought I was done for, sure, and 'The End' was on my film. But I'm glad to be alive, Mr. Chase, and I'm grateful to you. I don't know how to express myself any better."

Howard was surprised at the man's language and the evident marks of his culture and education. Seymour was a very large, awkwardly built man, with a plain, common-looking face, but a good brow and a clear bright eye. Howard liked him, and in his usual enthusiastic manner proceeded to get at his real aim in life.

"I want to know about the films; I mean about your part in them. When you get able to talk matters over I want you to give me inside information about your exchange, the source of your supply, the chances for bettering the shows, and so forth."

Jake Seymour leaned forward in bed and gave Howard a look of real interest.

"Say, you're the first preacher in this town ever talked like that to me. They're always blaming me for the character of the shows—I can tell you a lot of things about the business. I'm just as much interested as you are in getting good films. But I have to take what they send me. Many a time I don't see the fool thing till it's wobbling over the screen. And I've put my hand over the shutter more than once to cut off something I knew was coming that the kids ought not to see. I'll be awful glad to talk it over with some one who has sense and understands."

Howard's eyes glowed with eager interest.

"When you're able to talk we'll have a great time. We'll get the Agent here to write a scenario with a railroad thriller in it that will be the real thing. I know the Agent could do it in fine style."

THE Agent actually blushed so that his pink eye-brows were nearly as invisible as Howard's.

"I don't know but he could do it all right," Jake Seymour grinned. "Perhaps you don't know it, Mr. Chase, but in between setting the signals, selling tickets and opening the key to Lawton he's leaning towards literature. I've seen some of his pieces and they ain't half bad."

Do husbands know much about housework?

INDEED they do not.

And maybe the man who first thought of making Gold Dust got the idea when he was home under the doctor's care.

On Sundays when we men folks are home, Wife keeps the housekeeping very much in the background.

But now and then we get laid up and have to stay home on a week-day.

Then! Well, any man who smiles at woman's work had better take just one day off and keep his eyes open.

That daily grind of house-keeping—those constant nagging interruptions—the everlasting dishwashing would drive most men distracted in a week.

Dishwashing seems to be a bug-bear at best. But when a good dinner—say of roast lamb—has left the dishes especially greasy, women need all the help they can get.

Even a man can see that dishwashing could be done quicker if the grease came off easier.

Anyway, the man who invented Gold Dust did give women something that takes the grease off much quicker—when a tablespoonful is used in the dishwater.

DON'T you want to order a package from your grocer and see how much dishwashing time Gold Dust saves for you? But for Gold Dust results be sure it is Gold Dust you get. It comes in large and small packages. It is for sale by grocers everywhere.

The Busy Cleaner

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY

The Agent blushed redder than ever. "He's kiddin' you, Mr. Chase. I've never broke into print yet. Looks as if he semaphore was always set for me to lay down and stop."

Howard was delighted. It seemed to him that every day he was discovering some new and interesting types in Red Hill. He had not suspected the Agent.

"Some day when you're not busy come up to the parsonage and let me see some of your stuff. I've been practicing some myself on the magazines, and I believe either of us could beat some of the matter they print. Come on up some time."

"I'll do it, Mr. Chase; I believe I could get one of my pieces into the Railway Man's Magazine if I could lick it into shape."

"I'm sure you could. If I was the editor I'd pay three cents a mile for it." Howard grinned and the Agent and Seymour joined in a loud laugh, as Howard rose to go.

"You got hurt yourself, Mr. Chase," Seymour suddenly said with gravity, and with marked delicacy, not seeming to call attention directly to the remarkable absence of eyebrows.

"Only some of my beauty rubbed off. I'm hoping it will grow on again."

He shook hands with Seymour and the Agent and went out with his swift but not noisy manner.

AFTER he was gone, the Agent sat silently staring at Seymour. He had come over to sit with the moving picture man until his brother came in on the Newton freight.

"He's a fine fellow," said Seymour at last. "Never thought I should ever owe my life to a preacher."

"Yes," said the Agent slowly and in a low tone. "And doesn't it seem a pity, if it's true, what's going the rounds?"

"What's that?" asked Seymour, sitting up, and his face took on an eager look.

"Haven't you heard? The Expressman told me this afternoon. It's all over town. He and Inez Clark—"

Here the Agent dropped his voice still lower and leaned over the bed as he finished his sentence.

"I don't believe it," said Seymour, throwing a big fist down on his bed cover. "Don't believe Mr. Chase is that kind of a man."

"Well, I don't either. But it's going the rounds," said the Agent slowly.

Late that night Howard finished his sermon. And leaning his elbows on his desk he looked up at the picture of Christ which Roy Lennox had given him.

He looked at the picture with his gaze absorbed and his whole person removed from his surroundings. If he had been born in India he would have understood the mystic and the trance dreamer. Yet no one so wide awake and earth-born and earth-interested as he.

There in the night quiet as he sat detached from all his surroundings his mind was moving forward to his morning service; his vision outlined the audience; his heart longed for a visible response to his message; his whole passionate desire breathed the longing for real results in his hearers' lives; and as he gazed at the Christ it seemed to him he was going to have his prayer answered.

"Why should I wait any length of time in my ministry before I win souls? Why may I not get results tomorrow?"

Later on, if some reverent spirit had been allowed to look into the study, it would have seen the new minister of Red Hill kneeling by his desk, his head on his hands, praying out of a wide-awake spirit for a Pentecostal Lord's Day.

SUNDAY morning dawned over Red Hill a perfect June day, and when Howard stood up to preach he faced a congregation and a condition of human interest without a parallel in that little Kansas town.

It was like his first Sunday, only twice as many people. Farmers' automobiles lined the road, people stood outside eagerly trying to get a look through the open windows, and an air of expectant interest greeted Howard.

And yet, in spite of the fact that his preaching was unlike anything the people had ever heard and his prayer at the close made the audience sit in painful hushed attention, the result was altogether disappointing.

He said to Rose after it was all over and they were back in the parsonage for dinner:

"I don't know what the matter is. But I didn't get anywhere today. Something wrong somewhere."

Rose did not answer at once. "I think you're tired. But the people may have been affected by your looks. Did that trouble you?"

He laughed a healthy, natural laugh.

"No. I forgot all about that. Do you think the people let it get in the way of my message?"

"No. You silly boy, don't you realize they came in a crowd today to see the hero who threw Jake Seymour across the street with one hand? That's what 'swelled the audience,' as the papers say. The absence of your eyebrows was the public proof of your heroism."

"Heroism!" he exclaimed. "If I thought anything like that brought the people to church—"

His horror of cheap claptrap, of sensation, of running after the latest fad, caused a feeling like disgust and dislike of humanity. He was too sane and healthy of spirit to allow such a mental attitude to prevail, but he could not shake the feeling off, and it followed him throughout the day and into the evening service.

THE crowd at that service broke all records for church attendance in Red Hill. The evening was perfect. Elder Noyes preached what he called an old-fashioned Gospel sermon. The young people under Miss Burton's direction sang with spirit and evidently pleased the crowd; the other ministers took their parts acceptably, and under any ordinary conditions Howard would have called the evening a great success and gone on to plan with enthusiasm for the future. But he came into the parsonage after the people were gone and the lights all out, looking and feeling more depressed than Rose had ever seen him.

"Something gone wrong today, and I can't lay it to my eyebrows," he grinned, but not in his usual careless fashion. "We got no results either morning or evening."

"Only the crowds," said Rose, trying to cheer him up.

"Crowds! What are they? What use is a crowd if it doesn't do something, commit itself, take a stand, change its habits? A crowd does not mean anything, sister, to me, unless it does something more than come to a meeting. It must not only come, it must go, and go in some real, positive, conscious way, or all preaching and meetings are empty things. And did it seem to you that the ministers were rather cold and unfriendly?"

"Why, no. You must have imagined it. They seemed friendly enough to me."

"I must be tired and imagined it. But it seemed to me they acted a little queer. You know I'm sensitive on that point. I want people to like me. I like to be liked."

"And you are liked. Howard, do you realize that in the few short weeks you have been here you have won the people? Mrs. Burton said today she never saw anything like it. The people just can't help liking you."

"Is that so?" He laughed like a boy, but he was immensely pleased.

"I can go to sleep on that, little sister, but somehow the day was not a success. Let's forget it, and try again. I did my praying all alone. I'll get the other men to join me before next Sunday."

BUT when morning came and he began his week's work he felt an unusual depression as if an intangible something was in the air. He went down town, and people greeted him as usual and spoke of the great Sunday meetings, but he felt an unspoken reserve or difference in manner, which annoyed and disturbed him mentally, because he could not define it to himself. Even Deacon Burton did not seem quite the same when Howard stepped into the store on his way back from the post office. And Deacon Burton was fast winning a very warm place in the young minister's heart.

Uniform Tires

(99 Per Cent Excellent)

Built by Uniform Men

(96 Per Cent Efficient)

MANY manufacturers build good tires. But each producer's problem is to build ALL of his tires as good as his best one. To make them as uniform in mileage as they are in looks.

Even tires built side by side often vary thousands of miles. Were it not for this, certain great brands would equal the Miller.

For Miller has succeeded in building tires the same.

Not a few — not certain "lucky" tires. But 99 Millers in 100. Less than 1 per cent ever need adjustment.

Miller  Tires
GEARED-TO-THE-ROAD

Tires are bound to vary about as the workmen do, because they are mostly handwork. To build them uniform, "human variables" must go. That's why, three years ago, we began to keep books on every tire built, and on the man who built it.

We brought in experts on scientific management. And the master tire builders were used to train the rest.

Many withstood this new order of efficiency and are building Miller Tires today. Those who fell below the mark had to go elsewhere.

Perfection demanded the survival of the fittest. This body of Miller men is known today as Tire-dom's crack regiment. Their efficiency averages 96 per cent.

And more than 99 per cent of their tires exceed the warranted mileage.

Geared-to-the-Road

Miller Tires are Geared-to-the-Road. Look how the ratchet-like tread takes hold of the ground. This keeps wheels from spinning when you start — it gives positive traction while you are going.

This year we'll produce enough for only one motorist in fifty. Because few workmen can be trained to this perfection. Better speak to the authorized Miller dealer at once for your supply.

Champion Toledo
Dependable Spark Plugs

YOU'VE read how the fighting planes maneuver—a quick climb—then a plunge—a sharp turn—then a quick reverse turn—can you conceive of anything standing such strains?

Yet each plug must deliver an independent spark every sixteenth part of a second and every spark must come on the instant and fire every charge in every cylinder every time.

That dependability to which one may safely entrust life and limb, if need be, is inherent in Champion Toledo Spark Plugs.

When you realize that Champions supply the spark of life for an overwhelming majority of motors of all kinds, you appreciate how faithfully we are attaining laboratory results in quantity manufacture.

When you buy spark plugs see that the name "Champion" is on the porcelain—not merely on the box.

Howard Chase

Under any ordinary circumstances he would, acting on his absolutely frank and undiplomatic nature, have gone at the heart of the trouble and tried to find out the reason. But he decided it was a case of unusual "tired," or something left over from his moving picture night experience; or possibly people were embarrassed on account of his looks. And so the week passed with no special incident until Lennox and his wife arrived on Friday.

Rose and Howard were down at the station to meet them so they wouldn't "get lost among the population," as Howard reminded Roy, and they escorted them up to the parsonage and rejoiced to see them installed in the best room with a promise to stay for an indefinite visit.

Howard had not seen Inez since he saw her in the chorus on Sunday, and Rose had been to the printer's with his copy and secured the dodgers, doing it under the guise of helping him while he was busy with his elum, and so forth. The Rev. Mr. Gray was to be the preacher, and the circulars printed rather a full program of special music.

Saturday Howard spent busily with Lennox in preparation for the Sunday meetings, going over his plans with his seminary classmate, who showed the greatest enthusiasm in everything.

"I believe there's work enough here for two men," Lennox said, as he watched Howard pull benches around the yard, screw electric lamps into new connections, reconstruct a part of the platform to give the chorus more room, and go from one thing to another with a quiet swiftness that looked easy but was in reality the price of constant and untiring practice.

"I've had my hands full ever since I came," Howard replied with a cheerful smile. "Not a dull minute. After supper I'll take you down to see the man who's responsible for my lost eyebrows. This is an exciting parish."

LATE that night, after he and Roy had come back from an interesting visit with Seymour and after the others had retired and Howard was alone in his study, a quiet knock at the door brought him out into the little sitting-room. Evidently he had not heard or paid attention to the first knock, for as he was about to open the door the rap was repeated, and when the door opened Deacon Burton was seen there on the little porch.

He stepped in and greeted Howard gravely.

"I want to see you alone, Brother Chase."

"Come into the study," Howard said, surprised, but calm, as he always was, inwardly.

Deacon Burton went in and Howard closed the door.

The deacon laid his hat down slowly on the little table by Howard's desk, and taking the seat offered him, he sat down and looked earnestly and Howard thought sorrowfully into his pastor's face. Howard was totally in the dark as to the object of the deacon's call. But he sat there facing him with a fast-growing conviction that something like a tremendous event was about to happen, or that a crisis of some great and impending meaning had suddenly come upon him. The soft June night was very quiet about the house and the two men in the minister's study.

CHAPTER VI

"BROTHER Chase," said Deacon Burton slowly and gravely, "I have come to talk with you plainly and I believe you will understand why. Let me say first of all I have no motive in coming here tonight except my love for the church and my great, may I say affectionate, regard for you as my pastor."

"I understand that," said Howard eagerly. "I have the same feeling for the church and for you."

Deacon Burton regarded him earnestly.

"I want to believe that. What I have to say is all the more painful on that account. Do you know about the report going around the town about yourself and this girl Inez Clark?"

The question was so blunt, so direct and so unexpected that Howard, who had been leaning forward toward the deacon, fell back in his chair as if the deacon had struck him. His face was pale, his hands were clenched, and he was silent. Then he said, very slowly as if holding himself in check,

"No, Deacon Burton, I have heard nothing. This is the first—"

And then he paused with a hesitation so curious that Deacon Burton looked at him with a troubled look.

"Of course I have lived here long enough to know that Red Hill is notorious for its gossiping habits. That is what made me slow about coming to you with this story. But it is so prevalent, it is, I am grieved to say, so generally credited, that I felt as an officer of the church and—and—one at heart anxious for your welfare that I ought to come to you direct and see why you did not deny the story if you had heard it and to find out the real truth about it if you had not."

"I don't know what you are talking about," Howard said with his usual frank straightforwardness. "I have not been charged with anything. How can I deny a thing I have never heard?"

Deacon Burton looked at his young pastor thoughtfully.

"Do you mean you have not heard what the whole town is talking about?"

"Yes. I don't know what it is and I don't know what you are talking about."

THE deacon eyed him curiously and closely, then his face cleared and he breathed a long deep breath as if his mind were greatly relieved.

"I don't believe you can look me in the face like that and say anything less than the truth. I haven't lived in this town nearly all my life without learning that sometimes the person most talked about is the last one to hear about it. I am going to tell you plainly the story that is going the rounds. It will then remain for you to decide what you ought to do."

Deacon Burton went on then to tell in a very plain, direct way the story Mrs. Wilson had told Mrs. Gale, with several additions such as generally accumulate around the original setting.

When he was through, Howard, who had listened gravely but not with any signs of deep embarrassment, simply said:

"Deacon Burton, if this thing you have told me did not reveal a condition of mind in this town that is a moral tragedy, it would be so laughable that I ought not to pay any attention to it. But of course I understand what it might mean to me and to the church to keep still about it. Fortunately I can easily prove that the story has no foundation, only of course we must take into account the poor girl. I—" and at that point, to the good deacon's uneasiness, Howard paused in real embarrassment, as if something had suddenly occurred to him that entered into the situation to complicate an otherwise rather simple problem.

Uncle Sam's Kitchen Garden

UNCLE Sam's backyard kitchen garden, during the season of last year, contained 1,150,000 acres of land. Of the product of the backyards and vacant lots 500,000,000 quarts went into glass jars, besides what was delivered F. O. B. on the table or sold to local dealers. The nation's food supply has been increased by more than $350,000,000. From a wasteful nation America is being transformed into a nation awake to the value of crumbs of food. The board bill of the soldiers is not much less than $1,000,000 a day, with a prospect of having a much larger army to feed, and all of the soldiers are non-producers. The reserve stock of food at all the thirty-three camps is worth $4,125,000. With the experience of last year to guide them, our city and town farmers should do twice as well this year.

Rainbow's End

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONCE, as a rather tiny girl, I started off to find the end of a rainbow. For I had heard rumors, vague rumors, that spoke of a Pot of Gold which lay waiting, at the place where the rainbow touched the earth, for any eager adventurer to find.

It had been storming, and the sky seemed to shine with a freshly washed look as I started out across the fields on my quest. The rainbow, all quivering rose and orange and purple and green, swept impressively across the heavens and down over the top of a violet-tinted hill. The Pot of Gold would be waiting, I reasoned in my tiny girl way, just on the other side of the hill.

The hill didn't seem very far away when I first glimpsed it. But as I plodded on over the damp, fragrant fields, my little legs grew tired. It seemed as if I had walked many miles before I reached the first gentle slope that led to the steeper ascent. I toiled wearily, breathlessly up the hill. The summit seemed very far away indeed, but I was a determined child, and I struggled on, pausing only occasionally for rests.

And then, at last, I reached the hill-top. And, standing there, I peered eagerly down into the valley on the other side, where I had thought to find the Pot of Gold. But as I looked down I became suddenly conscious that the sky was dark, and that the twilight was creeping down, and that home was very far away, and that the rainbow had quite disappeared from the sky. And I sat down, there on the hill, and sobbed as if my little heart were broken. For I knew that the pot of gold had vanished with the rainbow, and I was tired. . . .

Rainbows are elusive things—as elusive as they are beautiful. Their prism-like colors are radiantly bright, but they have a habit of fading, all at once, into space. Rainbows are as perishable as soap-bubbles, which can be broken by the prick of a pin; as dreams, that may be dissolved by a breath of doubt; as castles in Spain, that are so often shattered by a sigh. Rainbows seldom last until the adventurer reaches the Pot of Gold.

I was a tiny child, and I had heard vague rumors. So with my eyes on the ground I toiled wearily up a steep hill until I gained a barren summit far from home and shelter. I kept my eyes on the ground, little guessing that the rainbow, as elusive as it was beautiful, had disappeared.

The world is full of grown-up children who are ever following rainbows in the hope that they may find the Pot of Gold that lies at the end of the road over the high, violet-tinted hill. The rainbows that they seek to follow may be symbolic of ambition, or wealth, or material success. These grown-up children struggle ahead through briars, maybe, and across ravines, and past forests, in the hope that they may find the place where the shaft of tinted light dips into the green earth. For at that place the Pot of Gold may be waiting—the Pot of Gold that grown-up children call Attainment.

Usually the ones who are following the rainbow of fame or ambition or success travel with their eyes on the ground, forgetting to watch the sky, as I, a tiny girl, forgot to watch it. And so, when they reach the hill-top, they usually find that the rainbow is gone, and that the clouds above are gray, and that home is far in the background, swamped by the coming night, and—greatest tragedy of a tragic hour—that Attainment lies as far ahead as ever it did!

But there are other grown-up children, wiser grown-up children, who follow a rainbow that is symbolic of love and faith and happiness. And usually they, after they have started on their quest of attainment, pause to look up at the sky, and, seeing the radiance above, stand spellbound in the fragrant, damp fields. Oftentimes they call the attention of wayfarers to the beauty, oftentimes they show the light to eyes that have never seen it before. Oftentimes, lost in rapture, they breathe a prayer—a prayer of real thanksgiving—because they have the gift of seeing beauty and knowing it when they do see it.

And, as the rainbow fades slowly, calmly from the sky, and the horizon line turns dusky with the mist of evening, they wander back, gladly, to the home that is still near—the home that means rest and protection and shelter.

AND the strange thing is that the folk who have not struggled ahead with eyes on the ground toward the mythical Pot of Gold—the folk who have been thankful for the chance to watch the beauty of the rainbow and to pass that beauty on to others—are the only ones who ever reach rainbow's end. For the miracle of color reflects straight from heaven to their souls, and the Pot of Gold—radiant, yellow gold—settles glowingly into their hearts.

As to our anthracite, which lies in northeastern Pennsylvania, we have not used more than one-fourth of the whole. At the time the mines were discovered the deposits contained something like 21,000,000,000 tons and there is still more than 17,000,000,000 within 3,000 feet of the surface.

It is the anthracite coal which more than anything else is causing our present congestion of freight and indirectly the coal famine. The coal is about the best in the world as far as domestic use is concerned. It has a great heating value and it burns without smoke. The result is we all want anthracite and the freight clogs the railroads.

Our coal consumption has rapidly increased since the war began, and to supply the demand of next year we ought to mine and ship half again as much coal as in 1914. The amount we should have for ourselves and for export is said to be 750,000,000 tons. We mined more than 600,000,000 tons last year, and, notwithstanding the shortage over the country, our output is now greater than ever before. Not only do we need more coal for our factories on account of the day and night speeding-up for the war, but something like 150,000,000 tons of coal could be profitably used by our allies, and especially Italy and France, which are now in the throes of a coal famine. We need more tons for the Navy and a great deal is required for the ships which carry supplies from this country to France.

The industrial demands of the war are increasing our production of coal as never before. We have mined almost a million and a half tons of coal daily throughout the past year. The total amount has been in the neighborhood of 640,000,000 tons.

Of that coal 550,000,000 tons were bituminous, the greater part of which was used for our industries and the railroads. About 90,000,000 tons of it was anthracite, some of which was employed in manufactures, but a great deal of which was used for heating our houses.

Our coal experts say that the question of a famine in coal is largely one of insufficient transportation facilities. We have enough mines open and new mines could easily be brought in if necessary so as to keep pace with our needs. We have an industrial army of coal soldiers of almost three-quarters of a million. According to John P. White, the president of the United Mine Workers, there is now a shortage of 25,000 miners in the anthracite fields, and the shortage in the bituminous fields of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois is more than 30,000. There has been a falling off of labor in the West Virginia coal district, and if these decreases continue the famine in coal will grow worse than ever.

One of the cure-rooms in the immense Goodyear factories at Akron, Ohio Copyright 1918, by The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

GOODYEAR

A MAN AND HIS WORK

Three thousand, one hundred and ninety-five of the Goodyear workmen own their own homes. More than three thousand of the remaining number are paying for their homes on contract. Literally hundreds of Goodyear employees share ownership in the institution for which they labor.

It is true in the Goodyear factories, that wherever mechanical appliance could supplant human endeavor with accuracy and saving, this has been done.

It is not less true, however, that the human element yet remains one of the largest factors in the goodness of our product, for machines must be minded by men.

So it is that upon the vast army of Goodyear workmen still devolves the responsibility for keeping this business alive and advancing.

And so it is that to these able workmen, Goodyear makes full requital of the respect that they have earned.

* * *

Goodyear always has clearly recognized the close relation between a man's well-being and his own good work.

And in this recognition have been born those manifold activities which Goodyear encourages on behalf of its people.

Far from being spent in any spirit of paternalism, these activities are launched wholly on a reciprocal basis.

It is the belief in this institution that if Goodyear takes care of its workmen, its workmen will take care of Goodyear.

There are baseball, football, musical and technical clubs at Goodyear, and more than a dozen clubs like them.

There are a legal advice bureau, a police department, a hospital, a factory library, a factory newspaper — all without charge.

There are housing, financial and health supervision, restaurant service, accident prevention and compensation, insurance systems and retirement awards.

There are schools for the advancement of competent workmen, for the Americanization of aliens, for the advantage of all who will use them.

On a tract of 400 acres now partly annexed to the city of Akron, Goodyear has itself developed a home-owning community of 2,500 people.

Not only homes, but parks and playgrounds have been perfected in this tract—one recreation field, equipped with swimming and bathing facilities, alone comprises twenty-eight acres.

It is the conviction of Goodyear that encouragement and self-help for its employees redounds to the good of their product.

Certainly we are going to gather gradually about us people who understand and appreciate these things, rather than itinerant workers.

Certainly also there is no safer bar against inept effort, unambitious endeavor and the indifferent application of fine material and equipment than the spirit of the worker who has faith in his leader's justice.

And certainly this spirit today prevails throughout the entire Goodyear institution, inspiring and cheering the whole of its men.

So it is, as we earlier said, that to its able workmen Goodyear makes full requital of the respect that they have earned.

And so it is, by way of fair exchange, that these workmen protect the excellence of their product, and our own good name.

Jesus Teaching by Parables

I Four Kinds of Ground. International Sunday School Lesson for February 17

Mark 4:1-20

A Study of Human Hearts

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

ONCE more beset by the multitude which followed him, Jesus took refuge in a little boat provided by one of his fisherman-disciples and preached to the crowd assembled upon the beach. Thus he was enabled to escape for a season from their importunities for physical blessings and to attempt to turn their hearts to his spiritual message. He gripped their attention by means of parables, little stories interpretative of real life, which obviously were told because of their deeper meanings. The first of these recorded by Mark we have been accustomed to call the Parable of the Sower, but for the purposes of our lesson to-day we had better call it the Parable of the Soils. For what we want to get at just now is the Master's classification of the hearts of his hearers, rather than his own blessed mission or the nature of the seed he sows.

Yet each of these is involved in this key-parable. For his kingdom was not to be established by the deeds of the conqueror but by the patient toil of the husbandman; it was not to be set up like a new military government, but grown like an improved sort of wheat; it was no arbitrary exercise of authority, but the spiritual cultivation of neglected fields. So he eagerly points to the sower at work on the distant hillside, patiently combating all the difficulties of Palestinian farming. How deep the analogy must have struck his own conception of his task! For the Galilean farmers left their homes in the sheltered village to go out into the open country, to scatter their dear-won seed where best they could, beset by birds and thorns, wayfarers and cattle.

The Reason for Parables

As Mark sees it, Jesus used the parabolic form of teaching partly to baffle his vindictive foes, who were always seeking to ensnare him, and partly to turn aside the light-minded follower if he were not stirred to real interest. One can readily see that the indirect nature of these stories made it hard for the Pharisees to catch up material for any specific charges against Jesus, and sometimes he seems to be deliberately challenging them to find anything if they can. And of all the unsympathetic hearers Jesus sorrowfully quotes Isaiah's terrible irony, that he was commissioned to show the people what they would not see, and tell them what they would not understand, lest by any chance they should repent and be healed.

But we may nevertheless be quite sure that the parables were the natural teaching of the Master's mind and were fundamentally used to present spiritual truth of the deepest kind in a simple, vivid form which loyal disciples could never forget. His primary purpose was not to baffle or to blind, but to guide and to help and to save. This is clearly demonstrated by the beautiful parables collected by Luke, such as those of the Forgiving Father and the Neighborly Samaritan (Luke 10 and 15).

The Heart That Is Hard

Let us now consider the explanation which Jesus made to the twelve when they besought him to give a full statement of his meaning. First, he spoke of the hard ground of the wayside, where the good seed found no lodgment at all. To me there has always come the thought that many a heart is hard because it has been hardened by circumstances, just as the winding path through the grain field is trampled by many feet. This path is often due to the thoughtlessness of the neighbors, who might better go some other way. Many hardened hearts are impenetrable to religion, because of the thoughtlessness of those who profess to be Christians, or because of actual ill-treatment of the worst kind. Lately, I met a poor lady, recently come to town, who rejected all proffers of friendship and acquaintance by neighbors and church people. After certain experiences of her daughter and herself, she had resolved never to make friends with any one again and never to have anything to do with the church. Oh, the pity of it!

Still others have been hardened by sorrow and pain, by the loss of dear ones and the vicissitudes of business life. Some have become hardened under the beating down of deadly monotony and daily routine, unlit by the influences of the holy and the beautiful. It is the tramp, tramp of every day that makes the wayside path like stone.

But more than these, I take it, are the hearts that have been hardened by selfishness, like Dickens's "Old Scrooge," or by sinful self-indulgences, or by bad habits, or by just plain neglect of God. The thing for those who are laboring for Christ's harvest to remember is that, after all, they are not rock but wayside. Some day the Vision Splendid may arouse them with a shock like the Christmas Angels aroused "Old Scrooge" in the immortal carol. Perhaps there will come to the selfish and the neglectful some shock that will not make them harder, but will "break them all up." That's the time to be near and ready to sow the precious seed of God's love. The planning of the varied ministries of a Christian church must be done in the spirit of the intensive agriculture of our colleges—reclaiming the waste places, breaking up the hardpan, draining the foul swamp, as well as using to the largest fruit bearing the good soil already in hand. "Ye are God's farm" (1 Cor. 3:9). Don't leave the hard places without ministry.

The Shallow Heart

How different is the shallow soil from the beaten path! Just a few inches of real earth, not enough depth for strong roots, not enough plant food for a good yield, no staying powers in a drought. I fear me there are many hearts like this. They "have no root in themselves." They are quick to take things up and quicker to let them drop when the weight begins to tell. They are strong on sentiment and short on sacrifice. They are often interested but never deeply stirred, because they are living only on the surface of things. The transitory fads catch them, but they cannot take up a life-work and carry it through despite persecution and tribulation. They are not fit for the kingdom of God, for no sooner do they put their hands to the plow than they begin to look back. The text that fits them is "Lord, I will follow thee, but—" It is surprising to see how soon that "but" comes out.

Such young people, such men and women are a difficult problem within the Church itself. They repay years of cultivation with but few ears of wheat. Occasionally one of them can be brought to the deliberate resolve of perseverance and effort and heart-interest, by prayerful personal work and wise leading by pastor or friend. Sometimes a powerful evangelistic message breaks through the subsoil of the soul, and a real conversion results.

The soil is not hard or shallow or poor, but it is pre-empted by other seeds. They may not even be seen as yet, but they are like the myriad weed-seeds in spring gardens—ready to spring up and choke the tender plants so carefully set out by the gardener. How applicable is this parable! For we all find in our own hearts at least the germs of innumerable evils. How carefully we must root out "every plant which our Heavenly Father planted not" from the garden of our hearts! (Matt. 15:13.)

But Jesus was not so much thinking of things evil and noxious in themselves! He was thinking of the everyday interests, the common burdens and tasks, the salaries and bills, the food and raiment, even more than the vulgar sins. These must not usurp the place of the Kingdom of God in our thoughts! It is as a botanist defined a weed—"A weed is any plant growing in the wrong place." That helps us to understand Jesus' astonishing combination, "the cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches." The rich man's money and the poor man's lack of money are in the same category if they keep both outside of the Kingdom of God. On the one hand is luxury and show, pleasure and privileges, and on the other worry and trouble, sordidness and anxiety. All these may hinder the growth of the good seed. Therefore, if life's burden is heavy, cast it on the Lord. If riches increase, set not your heart on them. Nothing must be permitted to compete with the will of our Father.

The Deep and Responsive Heart

We have left ourselves little time to speak of the good soil and the abundant fruits of the Spirit. Indeed, there is too much to be said for us to attempt it. Just consider the best men and women in Christ whom you know; just think of St. Paul and St. John; just remember Jesus himself. Then ask your own heart if you are bringing forth fruit of Christian character and service, a hundred-fold, or even sixty or thirty. Are we not all of us, to some extent at least, hardened, shallow, and preoccupied? Let us to our knees then, and remember that our Father is the husbandman. Hearts and soils are not unchangeable; yielded to the skilled touch of the Son of Man they may be deepened, broken up, if need be, becoming at last the very vineyard of the Lord, that he may be glorified in us.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

Expressing the Lesson in Weekday Life

THERE can be no real impression of the lesson without adequate expression. How to secure such expression is vital to good teaching. Unless the lesson comes over into the week-day life in some form of action or better living, it may be wasted seed. It is just here where the teacher who has put herself into the hearts and lives of the pupil counts.

A number of teachers have here told us their plans in getting their pupils to live out the teaching.

I put test questions to each along the line of their weekday lives. I ask for solution of social problems or spiritual problems that I feel they are confronted with in daily walks of life.

I try to make the lesson so attractive that every one wishes to go home and practice it during the week. They report their success the following Sunday.

I suggest work for others, making them see that helping in housework, going on errands or taking care of baby, is doing the noblest of work for Jesus, and that it is the little homely duties done well, or honesty in school work, that count for most.

By becoming acquainted with them in their homes and in their sports and joining with them.

I ask the individuals of the class to suggest practical ways in which the lesson can be lived.

The weekday life is carried out in the class committees: a Benevolent Committee, which works among the poor; a Calling Committee, which visits the sick and shut-ins, and a Missionary Committee, which conducts a mission study class.

By suggesting forms of social service, such as sending cards to a leper colony after lesson teaching on lepers.

I have the class members take a definite part, such as to suggest something to do.

The class has special work, such as visiting an Orphans' Home and helping care for some special girl in the Home.

I go to their places of business, and find out what their amusements are; then I show them how they can carry out the lesson in these ways.

Feeling all run-down

SO many of us—young and old alike—say "Oh, I can't enjoy things—I just don't feel like it." And so, run down in body and spirit, we drift along from day to day toward the very brink of a nervous breakdown, and yet if only we would realize that the source of the trouble is nearly always poor nutrition.

To be of aid in bettering nutrition and so help the weary and run-down back to renewed health and vigor is the very mission of Sanatogen, the scientific food- tonic. A mission which it has splendidly fulfilled according to the testimony of competent medical authorities.*

For Sanatogen, you should know, carries to the very blood and nerve centers the elements (protein and organic phosphorus) that make for robust nerves and well-knit bodies. And more—Sanatogen carries these essential foods in such a form that even the most anaemic system can easily assimilate them. Judge whether any ordinary tonic could gain the endorsements Sanatogen has gained—endorsements such as those from

Mme. Olive Schreiner Mme. Sarah Grand
Lady Henry Somerset John Burroughs
Col. Henry Watterston Sir Gilbert Parker —and then ask yourself if you cannot put your full trust in this food- tonic to help you back to a full enjoyment of life and health.

*Dr. Arthur F. Hopkirk, M. D., in his textbook on "Influenza" (Scribner's, 1914) says: "Sanatogen stands forth pre-eminent as a tonic food. This is no mere expression of an individual opinion but the statement of a fact firmly established by a vast array of clinical experiences."

Sent free on request—an interesting booklet, which tells in an entertaining way, about better health, happiness, achievement and Sanatogen's help. Address Bauer Chemical Co., Inc., 26 F Irving Place, New York City.

Sold by Drug Stores—everywhere. Three Sizes—$1.00, $1.50, and $3.50. No advance in price.

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

MRS. M. B. H. asked the prayers of God's people in behalf of her brother, who had become a victim of drink. She now praises God that he is again "clothed and in his right mind." She now asks prayers for herself and family, who seem to have lost the joy in religion of their earlier years, partly through ill health and financial reverses. Many members of the League have passed through the same severe furnace of affliction, and we trust that they will pray that this dark cloud may be lifted.

Mrs. H. E. H. asks prayer that she may overcome bodily infirmities that prevent her from attending church evenings. She testifies that her daughter was healed after being confined to her bed for five years, and is now able to make her own living.

Last February J. E. H. asked the prayers of the League for the conversion of a son and the healing of a daughter-in-law; and now comes the testimony that the son has been baptized and taken into the church, and the daughter has recovered her health. All four of J. E. H.'s children "have been converted and given work to do in the Master's vineyard."

C. W. B. rejoices at a revival in which a church received a shower of blessing, and thirty-five souls were gathered into the fold.

E. L. M. thanks God for healing, and asks the League to pray for a fuller answer to a prayer which has been partially answered.

K. H. D. acknowledges that God has graciously answered a prayer for the life of a beloved son.

Mrs. J. J. C. asked the prayers of the League for her crippled boy, who had not been seen since July 1. She now sends a telegram received from her wandering boy in a distant city. She also asks for bodily healing for her daughter.

Mrs. M. D. W. acknowledges an answer to prayer in the restoration to mental health of her son; and she now prays that he may gain spiritual health.

Mrs. C. M. praises God for the cure of her brother, who was a victim of drink. She now asks prayer for the conversion of three friends.

C. W. G. asked prayer for divine guidance in financial matters, and now he sends a part of the fruits of his industry as a thank-offering.

A Believer in Prayer acknowledges answer to prayer in the bodily healing of a parent who had been given up by the physicians.

Mrs. M. L. S. sees the hand of God in the rapid acquirement of speech by a child who up to the age of five had not spoken; also in the settlement of a family misunderstanding.

A. H. asks prayer for our brave soldier boys.

Last Spring "Anxious Mother" requested prayer that her son might be divinely guided in his business affairs.

REV. JOHN H. FAZEL, who is soldiers' pastor to over twelve hundred men in the army camps around San Antonio, Texas, writes that in his meetings and in personal interviews with the men in khaki there are many conversions and restorations. In addition to this he has received in one month's time over one hundred and fifty applications for affiliated membership in the Presbyterian church of which Dr. Todd is pastor. A membership card is issued and during their stay in camp they have a real church home and a pastor of their own to look after them.

HOW to hold the growing boys in the Sunday school has been solved by Rev.
George P. Howard, who reports from Buenos Aires, where six months ago there were no organized classes, that they have four in the English Sunday schools and several in the Spanish schools. A teacher brought his boys to Mr. Howard to discuss plans. Mr. Howard suggested that they organize and they have done so, calling themselves "The Live Wires."

She now thanks God that his troubles have been settled in a satisfactory manner.

E. M. W. thanks God for bodily healing in answer to a request for prayer made on February 7, 1917.

A. L. B. begs the Prayer League to continue in supplication for a blessing that was asked for some time ago, and also acknowledges an answer to a prayer that the life of a soldier friend might be spared. He has been wounded but is in the hospital, and hopes are entertained that he may be sent back to his family after he regains some strength.

I. M. asks prayer that she may be enabled to overcome personal faults and physical blemishes which stand in the way of her happiness and that she may be given strength to excel at her work; also that a friend may leave his evil ways and become a Christian, and that the members of her own household may learn charity toward another's faults and may grow in Christian grace.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Suffield, Conn.; Park City, Utah; Smiths
Grove, Ky.; Quincy, Mich.; Vernon, N. Y.; Chebeague Island, Me. (that many may be saved during revival); St. Charles, Mo. (that many may be saved during revival); Louisville, Ohio (that many may be saved during revival); Bulls Gap, Tenn. (that many may be saved during revival); Bourbon, Ill. (that many may be saved during revival); Los Angeles, Calif. (for a revival at the Baptist church); Edgerton, Mo. (that that town may be voted dry); Walnut, Neb.; Oxford, N. Y.; Omro, Wis. (for success of revival meetings at Willow Creek Church); G. H. Ashland, Ore. that a pastor may be sent to our church and revive the church; A Friend, that a spiritual man may be sent to Vestal Center, N. Y., to take the place of the retiring pastor; C. W. S., that God may open the way for me to enter on the work of an evangelist; A. R. N., Philadelphia, Pa., that a pastor may be sent to our church; Allentown, Ill.; Brigham, Canada;
Markesaw, Wis.; Kansas, Ohio; Riverside, Calif. (for a gracious revival in the First Baptist Church); Cincinnati, Ohio (that many may be saved during revival).

Mrs. E. B. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; M. W., that sister's mind may be restored; F. L., that brother's mind may be restored; H. S. S., that a doctor's mind may be strengthened; A. H., that mind may be strengthened; six friends ask prayer that minds may be strengthened; H. N. V., that husband's mind may be restored; Mrs.
E. W., that brother's and sister's minds may be restored; H. H., that a dear girl's mind may be restored; Mrs. C. E., that son's mind may be restored; S. E. G., that husband's mind may be restored; R. A. H., that daughter's mind may be restored; A Friend, that a sister's and brother's minds may be restored.
S. E. G., Mrs. A. L. A., and E. L. S. ask prayer that their husbands' sight may be restored; North Carolina Friend, that uncle's sight may be restored; N. N. V., that husband's sight may be strengthened; Mrs.
L. M. W. and Mrs. L. M. E., that their mothers' sight may be restored; Mrs. F. T. B., that son's sight may be restored; two wives, that their husbands' sight may be restored;
S. M. B., that mother's sight may be strengthened; nineteen friends, for restoration of sight for themselves, relatives and friends.

Fifteen friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing; M. L. C., that daughter's hearing may be restored.

Twenty-five friends ask prayer for special blessings for others; including R. M. B., that our President may be given counsel and wisdom; A. H., that our sailors and soldiers may be blessed; Mrs. J. I., for our boys in training camp, also for our President; M. A.
T., that an only son of missionaries in Africa who is a German prisoner may be kept in good health; Missouri Reader, for a mother recently bereaved by a darling child burning to death, that she may receive the consolation and sustaining power that God alone can give; Mrs. E. B., for those who are suffering the loss of loved ones.

Seventy-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. A. W. asks prayer that brother and his six sons may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. P. R. W., that son may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. A. D., that son may be cured of the liquor habit; E. F., that son may be cured of the liquor habit; two sisters, that their brothers may be cured of the liquor habit; four friends, that friends may be cured of the liquor habit; A Believer, to be cured of the drug habit; M. L. W., that nephew may be cured of the liquor habit; Mrs. C. H., that a young man may be cured of the liquor habit;
Mrs. J. S. S., that a man may be cured of the liquor habit; A Believer, to be cured of the drug habit; Mrs. L. T. P., that son may be cured of the tobacco habit; L. M. N., that husband may be cured of the tobacco habit; L. W., that son and brother may be cured of the liquor habit;
E. G. and Mrs. M. J. D., that brothers may be cured of the liquor habit; A Believer, that a young man may be cured of the liquor habit;
Mrs. M. L. K. and Mrs. C. G. N., that sons may be cured of the tobacco habit.

One hundred and fifty-four friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. E. W., that a friend's daughters may be healed, that one may regain the use of limbs and the other's shoulder may be healed; K. B., that niece may gain the power of speech and gain the use of limbs; M. C. S., that a young minister may be restored to health and strengthened; A Friend, to be cured of cancer; G. H., that health may be restored without an operation; C. E. W., that health may be restored without an operation; Mrs. H. C. G., that health may be restored without an operation; L. E. H., that a teacher may be cured of cancer; Mrs. T. R., that sister may be healed of a tumor without an operation; Mrs. L. L. S., that daughter may be fully restored to health and strength;
One hundred and three friends, for healing of self.

Forty-four parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty-two wives, their husbands; Miss F. E. W., for two unsaved husbands; eighty-four other relatives and friends, including Miss I. M., that a friend may be fully converted.

Forty-five friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Sixty-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of various desires and needs, including nine friends, asking prayer for world wide peace.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

Among the Workers

One of the boys turned to the teacher and said, "It is going to be very interesting after this: now watch our class grow!" Mr. Howard was to meet them in the church the following Saturday to take up the matter of personal purity. From another school the superintendent came in great perplexity. He declared that he had been leading the boys and girls up to the fifteenth or sixteenth year and then had to see them drop out. Mr. Howard suggested organization and through-the-week activities.
So they organized their young men into "The Forum Club" and their girls into "The Sunbeams." That class of young men has almost doubled, and there is no danger of their dropping out now.

As a result of the arousalment of religious and educational institutions in Japan the necessity has arisen for greater training of pastors and leaders. Three institutions offer to open departments in Religious Education. They now request the World's Sunday School Association to give a year's training in America to Christian Japanese.

Students thus trained will become teachers.
One institution is Presbyterian, another Reformed, and the third Baptist. It will cost about $600 to bring each student to America and provide instruction and maintenance.
While the Sunday school has advanced 40,000 in Japan in the past two years, greater progress could be made if pastors and leaders could develop the Sunday school possibilities of their fields. Such a contribution would be an investment bearing large dividends.

IN a report issued by the Bureau of Mines
It is stated that among 1,440 miners of the Mother Lode district of California examined for hookworm infection, 444 miners were found to be infected; and 91 miners have taken the treatment and got rid of the infection.
The statement is made that 50 to 80 per cent. of those working in these mines are infected.

Why, How and When

Motor Car Bearings Should Be Adjusted

The inside of the cup (shown at left) of a Timken Bearing, which fits into the hub, is tapered to correspond with the outer taper of rollers and cone (shown at right.) This makes the bearing perfectly and easily adjustable.

On account of this conical construction of a Timken Bearing the parts fit together as perfectly after thousands of miles of travel as when the bearing is new and the adjustment entirely corrects the effect of wear.

Why Simply because motor-car bearings are subject to merciless hammering, vibration and heavy pressure. Any bearing ever made will wear in time. Unless it can be adjusted to correct the effect of wear it will become loose. Then it not only wears out more rapidly itself, but causes wobbling wheels, injury to gears, noise and other troubles, all of which are prevented by adjustment.

How In the case of some bearings this question can not be answered because they are not adjustable. They simply wear out and have to be repaired or replaced before damage to the car results.

Timken Bearings, however, can be easily adjusted, as shown by the illustrations on this page. As you see, the cone and rollers can be advanced a little further into the cup and the bearing is as good as new, because the parts are perfectly restored to their original relation to each other.

When About once in five thousand miles it is advisable to inspect Timken Bearings. The man in the garage, the chauffeur or the owner experienced in the care of his own car will readily know how and when to make the simple adjustment.

This adjustable feature of Timken Bearings is one of the reasons why in pleasure cars and trucks, above the lowest priced class, more Timken Bearings are used than any other make, at the points of hard service—wheels, pinions (or worm) transmission and differential.

Other reasons for Timken Bearing supremacy are given in an interesting little booklet, G-1, "How Can I Tell?" Sent free, postpaid, on request to

A Week in the World's News

Russia. He declared that Germany had made her acceptance of Russia's bases for peace contingent upon the adhesion to those principles and the participation in the Brest-Litovsk conference of the other nations warring with Germany; and that the failure of the others to recognize the conference had given Germany a free hand in the negotiations.

The Chancellor said that instead of the reply which had been expected, two declarations had been made by enemy statesmen—Premier Lloyd George's speech and President's Wilson's speech. He detected an altered tone in Lloyd George in that he did not abuse Germany and apparently sought a way to negotiations. But he still pronounced judgment on Germany, charging her with being guilty of all possible crimes. The Chancellor declared that attitude one "with which we can have nothing to do and in which we can discover no trace of a serious purpose to attain peace."

Before discussing Mr. Wilson's program the Chancellor outlined the steps that led to the formation of the German-Austrian alliance, which he designated as purely defensive, and declared that Alsace-Lorraine were and always had been German, although under French rule from 1779 to 1871, when, as he saw it, they were disannexed from France.

He noticed also a change of tone in President Wilson's speech which he ascribed to "The unanimous rejection of Mr. Wilson's attempt, in reply to the Pope's note, to sow discord between the German government and people."

Taking up President Wilson's propositions in order the Chancellor disposed of them individually as shown in the table on page 150.

The Chancellor closed with a declaration that "Loyal comradeship in arms, which had stood the test so brilliantly in war time, must continue to have its effect in peace." He said: "If the leaders of the enemy powers really are inclined toward peace let them revise their program once again. If they do that and come forward with fresh proposals, then we will examine them carefully, because our aim is no other than a lasting general peace."

RHONDDA ASKS AMERICAN SACRIFICE. Food Administrator Hoover made public on January 25 a telegram from Lord Rhondda, British Food Controller, in which he said: "Unless you are able to send the Allies at least 75,000,000 bushels of wheat over and above what you have exported up to January 1, and in addition to the total exportable surplus from Canada, I cannot take the responsibility of assuring our people that there will be food enough to win the war. Imperative necessity compels me to cable you in this blunt way. . . . I have not minced words, because I am convinced that the American people, if they know the truth, will not hesitate to meet the emergency." Mr. Hoover replied: "We will export every grain that the American people can save from their normal consumption." British labor is getting restive under food limitations, the railway men threatening to strike if conditions are not bettered, blaming the government for the shortage of food, although they were told that "the Food Controller could not work miracles or invent food."

AUSTRIA STRIKES FOR PEACE. At one of the conferences at Brest-Litovsk the Russian representatives were reported to have suggested to the German and Austrian representatives that if they failed to make a just and democratic peace, and if the war continued, they would still have their own people to reckon with. The slow progress toward ultimate failure of the Brest-Litovsk negotiations was reflected in Austria by the breaking out, on January 20, of a general strike throughout the kingdom, and 100,000 workers dropped their tools in Vienna and neighboring centers on that day. The strike spread rapidly until on the following day more than a million had ceased work and had joined the demonstration for peace. On the 21st the rumor was current that the Austrian ministry had resigned. On the 22d there were conflicting rumors, some saying that the strike had ended, but the more credible indicated that the disturbance was still spreading and that the Austrian people were about to be joined by the people of Hungary in their demand for peace at any price, without regard to Germany's interest. In the meanwhile the negotiations at Brest-Litovsk appeared to be of the "off again, on again, Finnigan" type, the latest report being that Trotzky had returned to Petrograd and intended to make another appeal to the governments of the Entente nations in an effort to secure their participation in the peace negotiations. Another rumor reported a peace treaty about consummated between the German and Austrian representatives and the representatives of the Ukraine, while there were still other rumors that told of fraternizing between Russians and Austrians on the southwestern front, of increasing Bolshevik influence in the Ukraine, and of a threatened uprising of Rumanian forces against the present government. It was given out at Petrograd on January 24 that a wireless message received there by the Bolsheviks had announced a revolution in Vienna, with a provisional cabinet named by the revolutionists. This report was not supported by later and more direct dispatches, but enough was known at this writing to indicate that internal conditions in Austria were in a ferment that was causing much anxiety in Vienna and Berlin.

MURDER AND POLITICS. Following the adverse vote in the Constituent Assembly when a former Kerensky supporter was elected president, the Bolshevik authorities assembled guards about its meeting-place and announced that the assembly had been dissolved. Justification was sought for this action in the fact that the delegates to the Assembly had been elected under the former régime and did not represent the second revolution under the Bolsheviks. There were indications that the latent forces of the majority parties were gathering for the overthrow of the high-handed Bolsheviks. On January 20 a detachment of sailors gained admission to the Marine Hospital, where some of the members of the former régime were confined, and murdered in their beds A. I. Shingaroff and F. F. Kokoshkine, members of the Social Revolutionary party and of the former Provisional Government. On the following day it was reported that the arrest of the perpetrators of this outrage had been ordered.

CARSON QUILTS CABINET. Sir Edward Carson, member without portfolio of the British War Cabinet, resigned on January 21 and his resignation was accepted. The resignation was due to the Irish question, Sir Edward resigning, according to report, in order to strengthen the position of Ulster in the Irish Convention. He immediately went to Ulster for a conference of local leaders, and it was considered probable that he had resigned from the Cabinet in order to take up again the fight against Home Rule. In Irish circles his resignation was looked upon as rather strengthening the prospects of Home Rule than otherwise. On the 23d Sir Edward was reported as about "to throw the whole weight of his influence into the scale on the side of an immediate Irish settlement that shall include Ulster."

GERMANY DEMANDS ALL. The purported willingness of Germany and Austria to make peace on democratic lines, thinly veiled at all times, was completely unmasked before the return of Trotzky to Petrograd. In the session before his return on the 22d, General Hoffman demanded that Russia cede to Germany all territories west of a line running from the southern shores of the Gulf of Finland, through Minsk to Brest-Litovsk. South of that point he indicated the frontier would be arranged with the representatives of

Your War Garden

America can feed the world. Food will win this war. But the big farms cannot do it all because the labor situation is a serious problem. Therefore, the home garden, your garden, must be planted to a greater extent than ever before, that the maximum production from the farms may be sent to the Allies.

PAKRO SEEDTAPE AND SEEDS

Pakro Seedtape will help you to have a better, a more efficient garden. It is the scientific way of planting. The seeds are evenly and accurately spaced in a thin paper tape. And a whole row is planted at a time, resulting in straight rows of evenly spaced plants. Thinning out is practically eliminated. Your dealer can supply you.

The Quantity Package of Quality Seeds

kraine. Trotzky refused to comply and was grudgingly given a week in which to agree, leaving with the threat on his ear that his failure would mean the taking by the Germans of L'val.

ROOSEVELT LEADS REPUBLICANS. President Roosevelt went to Washington on January 21 for conferences with Congressional leaders in the interest of more effective war measures. His trip seemed to have eventuated in the practical acceptance of the Colonel by both the former old guard and the progressive element as the present leader of the Republican party. It was announced, following a dinner at which the Colonel met many of the present leaders of Congress, and also following a caucus of the Republican members of the House, that the policy of the party from now on would be a policy of constructive criticism of the war program as a patriotic duty. Mr. Roosevelt, on January 24, characterized Senator Stone's attack upon him as an "insidious effort in behalf of Germany."

TEN BILLIONS BY JUNE. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo on January 23 told the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the immediate passage of an Administration railway bill was necessary to the success of the nation's plans for war finance. He stated that banks, investment concerns and other similar institutions held more than $4,000,000,000 of railway securities, and as long as there was uncertainty as to the value of these securities the market for government securities was inevitably affected. He stated that it would be necessary to raise between now and June a total of $10,000,000,000.

CZERNIN SUGGESTS AUSTRO-AMERICAN NEGOTIATIONS. Count Czernin, Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, addressing the Reichsrat, on January 24, declared that he saw in President Wilson's outline of war aims a possible basis for the beginning of peace negotiations. He suggested that Austria and America might profitably exchange views as a starting point for a conciliatory discussion among all the States. He expressed confidence in a favorable outcome of the negotiations with Russia, the Ukraine and Finland, declared Austria's adherence to the principle of "no annexations and no indemnities" and said that the compliance with the Russian demand for immediate evacuation of occupied territory must be worked out in later negotiations, as the complete withdrawal of all troops and administrative authority at once would result in immediate anarchy.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The American gunboat Monocacy was fired upon by Chinese rebels along the Yangtze Kiang River on January 18, fifty miles above Yoochow. A sailor by the name of O'Brien was killed and two others were wounded. The Monocacy returned the fire. The Chinese Foreign Office made the United States a formal apology. . . . Director General McAdoo stated on January 19 that the government would not take over short line railroads not essential to the conduct of the war, but that these railroads would have to get along as best they could. He intimated that they would fare as well as formerly in their relations to the trunk lines, but the financiers and others interested in these railroads appeared apprehensive as to their future prospects. . . . Special cable dispatches to the New York Times on January 19 reported that food conditions in Germany had become so critical; that even embassies of neutral nations were unable to secure sufficient food. . . . In order to further expedite the movement of coal and food the Pennsylvania Railroad on January 20 established an embargo on the lines east of Pittsburgh on new freight shipments, except coal, food and supplies vital to the war program. This embargo was extended on the 23d to include the Philadelphia and Reading system. . . . The Attorney General's office at Washington announced on January 20 that Walter Spoermann, arrested at Norfolk as a German spy, would be interned for the duration of the war, as it had not sufficient evidence against him to prove him a spy. . . . On January 18 A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, reported to Congress that he had received 11,167 reports of enemy property and had opened 1,378 separate trust accounts, of which 1,236 were estimated as worth $134,605,231. . . . On January 22 the Federal Board of Farm Organizations, representing more than 2,000,000 farmers, appealed to the President for relief as to labor supply, credit facilities, seed shortage, and other vital questions. The board asked for a reply to its memorial at a meeting of farm leaders at Washington on February 6. . . . Arrangements have been completed for the use of 500,000 tons of Dutch ships now held in American ports by embargo regulations. Some of them will make the round trip to Holland with foodstuffs for Holland and Belgium. Most of them will go into the South American and East Indian trade, releasing the 150,000 tons of sugar in Java.

Progress of the War

ON Sunday, January 20, the Turkish cruisers Midulla and Sultan Selim, formerly the Breslau and Goeben, supported by Turkish destroyers, sallied forth from the entrance to the Dardanelles to attack the British blockading fleet. In the resulting action the British Monitor 28 and a small gunboat were sunk by gun fire, and the two former German cruisers were driven into the British mine field. The Breslau was sunk, the British rescuing 172 members of her crew. The Goeben, although severely damaged, succeeded in beaching herself on the west side of Nagara point, where she was bombed by British aviators, completing her destruction and preventing salvage.

It was officially announced from Italy on January 23 that the Austro-German forces had evacuated territory behind Monte Tomba from the Piave River westward, and had moved their first line back to Monte Spinoneia. The positions abandoned were dominated by the Allied positions on Monte Tomba taken in a spectacular action by the French some weeks ago. The new positions are at an altitude of some 4,000 feet, while the positions abandoned were only at half that altitude.

The Teutonic forces still hold their advanced positions on both slopes of the Brenta River, but this withdrawal, coupled with the reorganization of the Austrian High Command (Gen. Borovich succeeded Archduke Eugene in command of the entire Austrian front against Italy), was looked upon by military observers as an indication that the Austro-German forces did not intend to press the invasion of Italy at the present time.

On the other fronts there have been the usual patrol encounters, with an increase of activity in the air on the Western front, where the Allies reported a steady toll of German aircraft brought down with a minimum of Allied loss.

German troops on January 23 gained a footing in French first line trenches east of Neuport in Belgium, from which they were promptly expelled by a counter-attack.

Beside the Lafayette Escadrille, which is now in American service, there have been occasional reports of activity on the part of other American aviators, principally of Americans acting as observers with French pilots.

Gen. Pershing reported in the week of January 26 the death of four men killed in action. There has been no report as to the nature of the action.

The Germans lost two small torpedo boats between Heligoland and Jutland on January 24, the vessels running into a mine field; 17 men were saved.

U-boats in the week ending January 23 sunk six British vessels of 1600 tons or over and two under that tonnage. Three French vessels of more than 1600 tons and one of less, and one Italian sailing ship were also sunk.

Reports persist of a great German drive in preparation on the Western front. France reports herself ready to meet and shatter the blow, but details as to the preparations to meet it are not given.

Remarkable Coal Saving In Church Heating

IT has been proven over and over again that Kelsey Health Heated Churches save 10 to 16 hours of coal burning for the Sunday services.

To have the church comfortable for morning service, it is necessary with other heats, to start the fire not later than 3 o'clock Saturday afternoon.

With the Kelsey, the same church, no matter how high the ceilings, can be heated, in average weather, to exactly the same temperature, with the fire started at 7 o'clock Sunday morning.

16 hours of coal saved.

This sounds almost too good to be true. But when we explain the simple facts of why it is, you will at once see how entirely reasonable it is.

Because it saves coal for churches, it also saves coal for houses.

BLEEDING AND RECEDING GUMS

are manifestations of intermediate and advanced pyorrhea.

PYORRHOCIDE POWDER (Antiseptic)

aids in repairing these pyorrhetic conditions. This dentifrice has demonstrated its effectiveness since 1908, at clinics devoted exclusively to the treatment and prevention of pyorrhea.

PYORRHOCIDE POWDER removes the bacterial plaques or films which harbor the germs of pyorrhea and decay. It retards the formation of salivary calculus (tartar). This calcic deposit is the principal, initial cause of SORE GUMS, LOOSE TEETH and

PYORRHEA

PYORRHOCIDE POWDER induces normal blood circulation in the gums—increasing their power of resistance against pyorrhea infection. It cleans and polishes the teeth.

Busy Housewives Love the Bible Picture Study

ONE of the surprises of our Bible Picture Study is the number of letters from mothers, housewives, "home bodies" whose duties keep them busy in household tasks, praising the pictorial Bible study plan as a divine relaxation, a rest from the cares of the moment, a new world of love, hope and promise into which they can retire and find peace.

Even the busiest of mothers sets aside a "Bible Study Hour," in which she may enjoy the luxury of a complete change of thought, and from which she will emerge refreshed, strengthened, ready to go back to her routine with a happy smile.

Other housewives carry the pictures in their minds as they go about their work, and find it lightened and shortened by the fact that while dusting and sweeping and mending they are working out the fascinating problems in the Picture Study—working their way toward one of the large cash rewards, it may be!

Do not say that you are "too busy" to engage in the pleasant home competition. It may almost be said that the busier you are, the more you will enjoy the competition, and the better you will compete in it, for you will give it hours of thought while your hands are busy in routine tasks.

Read the letters below, from wide-awake housewives. Read every word. Then get your Outfit and see how the Bible Picture Study will put a new note of gladness into every hour of your day! This is indeed an opportunity for the stay-at-homes. How else can you obtain so much—not forgetting the very lively possibility of a big portion of $5,000.00 in cash!

Mother of Seven Children

Set Aside Quiet Bible Study Hour But Often Interrupted by Cries for "Mamma"

THERE are blots, verses marked out and others patched over in my little Answer Book—all speaking of the tired, care-worn hands of the mother of noisy boys. I could not give up, though troubled on every side and often perplexed as to time to write my verses—looking forward with the greatest pleasure to the hour when I could devote that time to the Reference Book. Sometimes weeks would pass by without a spare minute and then when I would steal away I would be interrupted by "Mamma—Mamma" calls from out of the five boys or the two girls as the case might be.

My books reminded me of the pages of my life—how unsatisfactory! But the good Father forgives and the blood of Jesus makes clean and clear just like I wished my book to be. "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." 11 Cor. 4: 6.

And I know that He gave me strength and courage to do my very best, though assailed on all sides and pressed for time. May His blessing be on all who join in the study. May they receive more light and understanding and may you prosper.

The Bible tells us that "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." He certainly has had a hand in this contest and has revealed unto us new beauties and sweeter knowledge of his spirit—Mrs. E. L., Texas.

A Pleasant Diversion

To Take Up Her Long Evenings

When I took up the study I had just been obliged to give up my old home where I had lived all my life and come here to a strange place and make a home where my daughter had work, and we could be together. I have passed through deep waters and sore troubles during the last few years, and felt the need of all the help I could get, both spiritually and financially. The Christian Herald had been very helpful to me in time of trouble, and when I read of the Bible study I thought perhaps this may be a way the dear Lord has opened for me, to take up my time and thoughts through the long evenings.

Now that I have just finished my work in this study I feel that should I receive no other compensation for it, it has been a great blessing and comfort to me, so I shall always be thankful that I undertook it. A stranger in a strange land, the dear Lord has seemed nearer to me than ever before; the many precious texts read and studied over and over have been a help and comfort to a heart so often sad and lonely for home and friends left behind. But I can look back and see how I have been led, thank God, and trust Him for future days, be they long or short.—Mrs. S. T., Maine.

Thought It Out

As She Went About Her Housework

I will say the Bible Picture study has been a great pleasure to me and also to the whole family. I would have it on my mind as I went about my work. It has been the means of more Bible research, which is good for anyone. May God's blessing rest upon the undertaking and may much good be derived from it.—Miss E. A., Ohio.

Our African Missions

Epworth League Topic. Psalm 68:31; Isa. 45:14

METHODISM is fencing off the jungle in Angola, the Congo, Rhodesia, and East Africa. There and in the earlier settlements in the southern part of the continent are six conferences, each of which is rather more missionary than otherwise. These conferences extend well up into the great black belt, and the missionaries of the Cross working northward are constantly meeting the missionaries of the Crescent working southward from Mohammedan northern Africa. Just now the once "dark" Continent is the scene of a spiritual warfare begun some years ago and modified only slightly by present world conditions, a warfare which will end with Africa won either to Christ or Mohammed. The missionaries of Allah are to a large degree the merchants who travel southward with trade in one hand and the Koran in the other. The missionaries of the Cross, entering into competition in a large degree with the trade of so-called Christian nations which comes with run in one hand and goods in the other, are meeting this double competition of Koran and booze with the open Bible, with education, with medicine and with Christian kindness. Everywhere throughout the jungle, straw-thatched shacks each with its bell, or in lieu of that a hoe, to welcome the traveler along the slippery paths of the tropical forest, proclaim the truth of Christ. Perhaps the only sign of a church is a bell fastened in the crotch of a tree under which the black men gather about the minister of the Cross to hear the words of the Gospel and to learn of the Saviour of mankind. And in that Moslem north, to the race that gave Hannibal to the world, that built Carthage, that is still brave and capable, a loyal ally and a terrible foe, schools are bringing to the children the gospel which their elders refuse to receive.

The tale of African Methodist Missions has been told as few missionary tales are told in "Methodist Trails in the African Jungle."

The Board of Missions is prepared to send this tale to any one who will forward 15 cents; the book will be sent free to leaders. The leader or Epworth Leaguer who tries to get through this meeting without the inspiring message of the "Methodist Trails" is both handicapping himself and missing an hour or two of reading that will make his heart beat quicker and give him new light in Christ and a new purpose in his service.

Address Ralph E. Diffendorfer, Educational Secretary, 150 Fifth Ave., New York City.

What My Denomination is Doing

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. 1 Thess. 1:2-8

It is suggested, again, that this meeting be led by the pastor or at least by some person high in the councils of the denomination. There has been a good deal of talk of late regarding what the churches have not done. Whatever may have been their sins of omission each denomination has been doing a great deal that was worth while, has been doing its best, within its human limitations, to carry forward the great commission of the Master.

There are four fields which lie before the eyes of the leader. Of these one is the home church. What is it doing? Is it the flaming beacon of spiritual light in its neighborhood; or is it a smoldering and partly quenched but nevertheless persistent flame? Is its altar wet with the tears of penitence or dry with the dust of outworn theories? Are its young people flocking into the kingdom or drifting into the world?

Then there is the Homo Mission Field. What are your church and its officials doing to lighten the dark places of America and her colonies? You will be surprised to find just how big is the

A RELIABLE GAUGE OF VALUE

In the big munitions plants every completed shell is tested by experts with a millimeter gauge. There must not be the slightest variation from the prescribed calibre.

In the advertising department of CHRISTIAN HERALD every advertisement is likewise tested for inaccuracies with the gauge of truth.

In this rigorous testing many advertisements are thrown back for revision or rejected altogether.

By thus protecting its readers, CHRISTIAN HERALD has made its advertising columns a reliable gauge of value. When you see anything advertised in CHRISTIAN HERALD you may be sure it has stood the severest tests of trustworthiness. You may accept it as the expert accepts the shell when his micrometer-tested calipers register to the fraction of a hairbreadth the required measurement.

home mission plant in your denomination.

There is, too, the Foreign Field, the heathen nations that hold up their hands to Christendom for release from the bonds of superstitions and religions that do not satisfy the human heart. Your denomination may be more effective in foreign lands than at home.

Then there is a new branch of work. The work for the soldiers in which there is room for each denomination to do its best without in the least overlapping the work of the Y. M. C. A. within the camps.

Even as the soldiers of Britain, France, Italy and all America are marching shoulder to shoulder against the common foe, so the great divisions of the church—the Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Disciples, Methodists, Lutherans—are marching forward in the warfare against sin, each deploying its forces for the best assault upon entrenched error and fortified wickedness, each supporting the others in the victorious assault.

The leader should consult denominational sources for the detailed information necessary to the success of the meeting.

A Unique Book of Recipes for Readers of the Christian Herald

THE Washington Information Bureau of the Christian Herald will send you free a copy of an unusual book of recipes—a book that deals exclusively with how to cook and serve canned foods.

Canned foods are a great help to the busy housekeeper, but it is often quite a problem to decide how to cook them and serve them so as to produce a tasty and varied meal.

A staff of skilled scientists and practical experts has been investigating just this problem, in a special laboratory in Washington, built for the purpose. Knowing the interest and the value of their work to every household, the Christian Herald has arranged to secure a copy of the booklet containing its results for each of our woman readers.

What the Book Tells

This book contains over 150 recipes. All the ingredients are available practically wherever food is sold. With a few words of introduction telling the most important thing to know in each case, it gives full directions for preparing appetizers, soups, entrées, vegetables, salads and desserts from canned foods, along with the necessary sauces, pastes, and dressings that turn them from "just food" into real delicacies.

Like all the service of the Christian Herald Information Bureau, this book of recipes is entirely free, and may be had for the asking. It is not necessary to be a subscriber to the Christian Herald in order to send for a copy.

Just fill in your name and address on the attached coupon, and mail with a 2-cent stamp for return postage, to the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C. Ask for the booklet on Canned Foods.

SONG STORIES OF THE SAWDUST TRAIL

By HOMER RODEHEAVER
Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

YOU can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ.

Homer Rodeheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail."

"Rody" in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing the four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. He relates how another song, "My Father Watches Over Me," sung at a mission service, called a poor, sick criminal and wanderer back to Christ and happiness. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associates, to his wife and family, and tells how all his former happiness was restored.

AFTER DEATH, WHAT?

By REV. MADISON C. PETERS

WHEN the late Dr. Klopsch published "After Death, What?" some years ago, the book was received with tremendous enthusiasm and the editions published by him were soon exhausted. Successive editions were not published, yet the demand through the intervening years has been large. For this reason we have thought it wise to bring out an entirely new edition of this wonderful book.

It is impossible to give more than the briefest glimpses of the rich character of the contents of this attractive volume. Among the subjects discussed are: "Does Death End All?" "Light After Darkness," "The Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "Heavenly Reunions," "The Joy and Comfort of Faith in Immortality," "Occupations in Heaven," "Our Children in Heaven," and many others, including poems of comfort and master minds on the life beyond. In addition to the above masterpieces of thought and literature, it contains a vast collection of golden gems from the greatest historians, philosophers, preachers and poets of all ages and nationalities on other phases of the future life.

CAP'N ABE, STOREKEEPER A CAPE COD STORY

By JAMES A. COOPER

DO you like to read about doings on Cape Cod, among the quaint characters who inhabit that locality? Would you like to read of what happened to a high-bred city girl when she suddenly landed down there to take up her living with a relative she had never seen? Would you like to read how loquacious Cap'n Abe, the storekeeper, who could tell more marvelous yarns than any other man on the Cape, suddenly disappeared, and of how his brother from "furrin parts" appeared to take his place?

Would you like to read about a most perplexing mystery that came near being turned into a tragedy, and of how a man who was a rank coward at heart forced himself to play the part of a hero? In this volume, humor and pathos are well mixed. Many of the doings along the Cape shore are taken from life. Tender love scenes are not lacking; and there is high excitement when a great storm wrecks a vessel off the coast and it looks as if some of the loved ones might be drowned.

To meet Cap'n Abe, is never to forget him.

Questions and Answers

D N., Providence, R. I. Is a Christian justified in praying for wealth in order that he may be able to accomplish great and desirable things?

No: because such a prayer would be unwise and ill-considered. The right uses of wealth call for the exercise of many qualities of character which few possess. Few realize that we are the stewards of our possessions, not the absolute owners. They are an endowment, and upon their right or wrong use depends whether they become a blessing or a stumbling-block. If a man has a sound body, a clear-thinking brain and the love of God in his heart, all other wealth is incidental. Nothing that contributes to the formation of character or to real happiness can be bought by money. That man is rich who has a sufficiency for his own simple needs, and who is able to assist others who may be less fortunate. That man is poor who, having overflowing coffers, holds them as his absolute possession, and by his love of display, his foolish indulgence of pleasure, or his selfish attitude toward others, prevents the development of his own spiritual nature and abuses his trusteeship. It is true that while wealth, in the hands of one who realizes his responsibilities, may do an immense amount of good, where there is no such realization riches are likely to become a source of moral weakness and failure. See Prov. 30:8; Matt. 13:22; Luke 18:23, and many other passages. Certainly, riches wrongfully or unjustly acquired can bring no joy or blessing, but the reverse (see Jer. 17:11). Any case of unusual skill in money-getting may easily become a menace to a community, just as certain weeds, if unchecked, are liable to spread quickly and desolate the garden.

Mrs. C. W. H., Lake George, N. Y. 1. The Turks are Mohammedans. 2. We have no recollection of the message of which you write.

G. N. B., Fountain City, Ind. I am informed that there is a great palace, built by German money, on the Mount of Olives at Jerusalem, Palestine, also a tower overlooking the country, and that from this building the German Emperor intended to rule his world-empire. Is there such a building there?

We have heard the story many months ago, as having been told by some speaker in England, but it is one that is impossible of confirmation.

J. B., Elmira, N. Y. Your letter on prayer and power is interesting to us. Men of prayer are men of power in the spiritual life. Living near to God and in frequent communion with him, they draw strength from the Source. Paul prayed for power that he might be "strong in the Lord." When one sincerely prays for power, and his life is regulated in accordance with God's will, he becomes a real spiritual force in his circle. Any pastor who

H. E. M., State Center, Iowa, writes us with a list of suggestions that will prove helpful to those who desire to live a better life, and to aid the pastor and help the church in its work of arousing conviction and winning souls. First, it is essential that the voluntary worker should personally have accepted Christ as Saviour. There are the kinds of service from which a choice can then be made: "Rededicate life to God and church. Unite with the church. Financially support it. Attend services regularly. Attend Sunday school regularly. Teach Sunday school class. Attend prayer meeting. Help with music. Join Epworth League, Missionary Society, or Ladies' Aid Society. Testify and pray in public. Read Bible and pray daily. Conduct to restore us, at our request or longing. God's covenant with his children remains unbroken. He may break away for a space, but God cannot change; hence God will receive us into favor again if we repent. "If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful. He cannot deny himself" (II Tim. 2:13; Isa. 54:1). (2) It is not possible to be a believer and not have evidence of it within oneself. This does not necessarily mean exaltation, or special spiritual experiences; but it does mean a changing of heart and mind from the carnal to the godly. A believer soon finds that things which formerly seemed innocent are now sin-laden, that thoughts and actions have a new significance, and life an entirely new meaning, not the least of which is the recognition of that peace which passeth all understanding.

W. H. M., Arden, Neb. How long was the Holy Family in Egypt?

The length of the stay in Egypt has been variously reckoned from a few weeks to three years, in accordance with the various dates assigned to the Nativity. Herod died in the year 750 after the building of Rome, four years before the date from which we begin our time reckoning.

J. B. M., Tallahassee, Fla. The church that has never suffered, which has known few privations, and which cannot point to a single memorable sacrifice or to one martyr for His sake whose name it bears, would be an anomaly indeed. It has been truly said that the Church draws strength from persecution, and that the suffering Church never dies.

G. F., Mississippi. "The refusal of our Lord to recognize the foolish virgins is definite and apparently final," says a commentator. There are others, however, who hold that it does not necessarily shut them out from ultimate forgiveness, finding a difference between the passages indicated and chapter 7:23. They refer the parable not to the final judgment, but to his personal reign. In this view, the lesson illustrates the blessedness of watchfulness and endurance unto the end.

"Only a Mother," East Stroudsburg, Pa. Thanks for your kindly letter, which is in line with our own desires, especially on the temperance movement. We are helping the battle all along the line, and especially in Congress, where the outlook is most hopeful. Our new book, "King Alcohol Dethroned," is regarded by many of the foremost temperance leaders in the country. Mr. W. J. Bryan included, as the strongest presentation that has yet been made of the whole question, and one that should be in the hands of every American.

Mary D., Bennington, Vt. It is unwise to vex yourself over what your friend probably meant to be a timely piece of advice. Blunt speech from an honest heart is far better than smooth and polished talk from insincere lips.

Mrs. A. J. E., Red Bluff, Calif. We have forwarded your letter to the International Y. M. C. A. War Work Committee for reply.

Mrs. D. B., Granville, N. Y. Paul was three times at Troas (see Acts 16:8; II Cor. 2:12; Acts 20:6). The last time he seems to have arrived on a Monday and stayed seven days, which included the Jewish Sabbath and the Lord's Day following. Verse 7 indicates that the Christian observance of the Lord's Day was already a fixed practice there, including the breaking of bread with the disciples, although this is not expressly stated.

On another page you will find an interesting announcement of the Christian Herald Information Bureau.

Red Cross Dogs of War, who go on errands of mercy. These four-footed soldiers are serving in Italy. The dogs carry a string to which a coil of rope is fastened. After an action they seek out the wounded men. When they reach a man he pulls on the string, ties the rope around his body and is pulled back to safety.

prays for power must spend much time in the Lord's power-house which is prayer. A church whose minister and officers are a consecrated band, which earnestly seeks to know the divine will, and where the prayer meetings are sessions of real communion, does right to pray for power to be of service in any field to which its energies may be drawn.

J. K. H., Columbus Junction, Iowa. Is this prophecy of Jeremiah about to be fulfilled (Jer. 23:7, 8)? "Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, The Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I have driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land." The "north country" might mean Europe; and "other countries" include the United States. There are 13,000,000 Jews in various parts of the world, only 40,000 in Jerusalem. Multitudes could return. The homecoming will be such a great event that they will forget their removal from Egypt, with all its miraculous escapes and sacred memories. Jerusalem is now in hands of friends of the Israelites. Is not the taking of Jerusalem one of the hopeful signs that we shall win the war?

We believe Dr. Gray deals with this important phase in his articles on prophecy now running in the Christian Herald. It is certainly a subject of intense interest at the present time.

E. T., Port Jervis, N. Y. The two have probably been regarded as not in any sense conflicting with each other.

or take part in family altar. Do personal work to win souls. Visit sick and needy. Call on new families." These suggestions may make the duty of personal service clearer to beginners.

Constant Reader, N. Y. Have you any assurance that the soldier boys to whom the Testaments and Christian Heralds are given will ever look inside of them? For instance, boys who have sat unmoved through one revival after another—would they appreciate or read a Testament or Herald if given to them? Boys who go from Christian homes will naturally be supplied with Bibles by their own people, will they not? These doubts have kept me from sending money to this particular fund.

We have the assurances of the chaplains and the Y. M. C. A. workers that the Testaments are more than welcome. Many of the soldier boys who express a desire to have a Testament have voluntarily pledged themselves to read it faithfully, and the Word has a mighty power to draw men to Christ. It goes to them with the prayer that it may be made a means of doing this. Surely if we are working sincerely to win souls, we should not neglect this great opportunity. President Wilson has strongly approved of this work of giving the Gospel to the Army and the Navy, and has given it a most cordial written endorsement.

L. E. G., St. Mary's, Ga. We have no record of the incident you mention.

Less old age

YOU can become a super-man in energy, vitality, courage, youth, health, pleasure, confidence, self-reliance—a super-man in personality, mind and body.

Are you living a full and successful life? Why not always be at your best—thoroughly well, virile, energetic? Why not invest in yourself and make the most of your every opportunity? It is easy when you know how. The Swoboda System points the way. It requires no drugs, no appliances, no dieting, no study, no loss of time, no special bathing; there is nothing to worry you. It gives ideal mental and physical conditions without inconvenience or trouble.

Make the Mere Act of Living a Joy

The Swoboda System can make a better human being of you physically, mentally and in every way. The Swoboda System can do more for you than you can imagine. It can so vitalize every organ, tissue and cell of your body as to make the mere act of living a joy. It can give you an intense, thrilling and pulsating nature. It can increase your very life. I not only promise it, I guarantee it. My guarantee is unusual, startling, specific, positive and absolutely fraud-proof.

You Can Increase Your Earning Power

Your success depends entirely upon your energy, health, vitality, memory and will power. Without these, all knowledge becomes of small value, for it cannot be put into active use. The Swoboda System can make you tireless, improve your memory, intensify your will power, and make you physically just as you ought to be.

The fact is that no matter who you are, whether you are young or old, weak or strong, rich or poor, I can prove to you readily by demonstration that you are leading an inferior life, and I want the opportunity to show you the way in which you may completely and easily, without inconvenience or loss of time, come in possession of new life, vigor, energy, development and a higher realization of life and success. Swoboda has written a wonderful explanation of the human body and its evolution. This book explains Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. It explains the Swoboda theory and laws of mind and body. It startles, educates, and enlightens. It explains as never before the reason for the evolution of the mind and body. It tells how the cells and their energies build the organs and the body; and it tells how to organize the cells beyond the point where nature left off for you.

It will give you a better understanding of yourself than you could obtain through reading all of the books of science and philosophy on the subject of the body and mind, because it explains principles that have never before been explained by scientists or philosophers. It is impossible to duplicate elsewhere the information it gives, and the value of the information is beyond estimate.

Swoboda has written a simple, but the first really scientific and philosophical explanation of the actual evolutionary cause of old age. This essay is a classic. It will stand for all time throughout all ages as the first basic and real analysis of evolution and ageing of the cells of the human body. It explains the psychological and evolutionary errors and elements involved in the production of ageing.

Without being compelled to study text books on psychology, philosophy, biology, histology, etc., you will through reading this brief analysis learn fully what is nature, when is nature not nature, what is the cause of growth, maturity, evolution and decay.

Swoboda has the happy faculty of being able to put a whole science into a comparatively few words. This essay will interest not only men and women who are merely interested in avoiding the nightmare of old age, and those who realize consciously that they are growing older in body, but it will also interest the scientist, the philosopher, the psychologist, as well as the pure speculator on the subject of life.

I predict that every man and woman will read this work and profit by it. It is the A, B, C of perpetual youth. It will mean astonishment to the scientist. It brings confusion to those who practice self-deception. It brings embarrassment to those who believe old age necessary. It seems bold, but this is only the effect of misconception concerning the necessity of old age.

You owe yourself a reading of this essay on the Swoboda philosophy and science. It will put you favorably in touch and in harmony with your creative forces. You will harness them, capitalize them, and employ them. The result will amaze you. This essay which Swoboda has written and copyrighted will be sent to you free of charge and free of all obligations to Swoboda if you will write for it. Just write your name and address on this page, tear it out and mail it to Swoboda, or draw a ring around your name on your letter-head, or merely send a postal, giving your name and address. Do it today. Read it, and learn how to be perpetually young, for you cannot afford to live an inferior life and to grow old. Address

A part of the water front at Hamburg where vast strikes were reported to have brought martial law

"MAKE peace with Russia or you will be hurled from power" was the answer of the leader of the majority Socialists, Philip Scheidemann, to the speech of Chancellor von Hertling, before the Main Committee of the German Reichstag. Thus German labor threw down the gauntlet to pan Germanism and imperial greed. Peace was not made and so a great general labor strike in Germany to force immediate peace without annexations or indemnities and general reforms had on January 31 become Empire-wide in extent. The strike, which began in Berlin chiefly because of dissatisfaction over the delay in carrying out the Prussian franchise reform, spread more or less throughout the provinces. Dispatches estimated that a million workers had abandoned industrial and munitions plants in the Hamburg and Berlin districts and in Bavaria.

The strike had spread to Munich, where the big Mauser armament works were involved, and some of the printing works engaged in the newspaper trade in Berlin had struck. The war plants at Tegel, Aldershof, Spandau and Mariendorf, just outside the capital, were closed. Spandau is a city of 70,000, nine miles west of Berlin. Numerous artillery, firearms and munitions plants are situated there. The other three places are small cities, but contain vital plants for the production of arms and ammunition for the army. In the Berlin district the number of strikers was variously estimated from 120,000 to 700,000. A correspondent said that 58,000 of the number were women.

The striking German trades unions made the following demands upon the Imperial government:

- "First—An answer by the German Government to the speech made by Premier Lloyd George to British trades unions.
- "Second—A statement of German war aims in the West.
- "Third—Direct representation of the working class interests in the peace negotiations in proportion to the representation of capitalistic interests.
- "Fourth—No further postponement of Prussian franchise reforms."

American State Department officials viewed the reports of internal strife in the Central Empires as a strong indication that the world conflict might come to a sudden end in the near future. The confidence in the outcome felt at the White House was shared by military and naval men.

German Labor Strikes for Peace

A Brief Outline of the Elements of Unrest Within the Kaiser's Empire

According to a Berlin report received through Copenhagen, Socialist leaders from all over Germany had been summoned to Berlin for a discussion of important home and foreign political questions. So grave was the situation that the Socialist party had requested President Kaempf to summon the Reichstag in special meeting forthwith, to discuss the alarming events of the last few days.

Hamburg on January 31 was in a state of siege. The military commander had ordered immediate cessation of the strike and had demanded that no labor disturbances occur in the future. Altona and Wandsbeck, suburbs, also were under martial law. All the great ship-building yards were said to be closed. Workers were flocking to the side of the Vulcan yards workers, who were the first to quit. All the workmen in the Kiel shipyards to the number of 50,000 and those in the Vulcan Works at Hamburg, and thousands of miners in the Rhenish-Westphalian districts struck, according to the Berliner Vossische Zeitung. Field Marshal von Hindenburg was reputed to have issued a proclamation warning the workers to stop the strike, and it has been displayed on the street corners of Berlin.

THE Berlin correspondent of the Politiken of Copenhagen reported that the strikers had formed a Workmen's Council of 500 with an "Action Commission" of ten men and women, including Hugo Haase, the Independent Socialist leader, and Philip Scheidemann, the majority Socialist leader. Other members of the Commission included George Ledebour and William Dittmann, Independent Socialists, and Friedrich Ebert and Herr Braun, majority Socialists. The Commission, it was stated, asked Herr Wallraf, the Minister of the Interior, to grant permission for the holding of meetings. Herr Wallraf, it was added, declared he would not negotiate with the workmen, but would receive Socialist members of the Parliament. Herr Scheidemann, Herr Haase and two workmen went to the Minister of the Interior and informed him of the action of the Commission, demanding unanimously that the negotiation take place in the presence of the workmen. The results are not known.

A dispatch to the Associated Press from Stockholm said that the German strikes are largely due to scarcity of food, quoting Svenska Dagbladet's Berlin correspondent. This correspondent asserted that the people were indignant over the exportation of flour to Austria, and also over profiteering and the illegal procuring of foodstuffs, which flourished despite the utmost efforts of the authorities.

The strikes in Hamburg and Kiel resolved themselves into hunger demonstrations. The extent of the food profiteering in Berlin alone is illustrated by a report in the Berliner Tageblatt that fines imposed in the Moabit Criminal Court in one day exceed 100,000 marks (about $25,000).

AMONG the views expressed in special dispatches from Holland in regard to the strike is one that the German Government is exploiting what hardly amounts to more than a peace-time demonstration, with the object, if possible, of producing a more serious movement in Allied countries, where it apparently believes the Governments are less able than itself to control such movements. Another correspondent gathered from the German press that the German Government intended to make the strike movement a pretext for breaking off the Brest-Litovsk negotiations, and was ascribing it to the machinations of the Bolsheviks, with whom, therefore, it would be impossible to hold further conferences.

While most newspapers printed with much prominence the dispatches from Holland and Switzerland representing the strike in Germany as being on an increasing scale and very serious, the Rotterdam correspondent of the London Daily News warned against an exaggerated idea of the size and importance of the industrial upheaval. Other newspapers reported that the workmen in forty war material factories in Berlin alone had struck, and that many strikes elsewhere had been accompanied by grave disturbances. The Daily News correspondent said the cessation of work in Berlin apparently was not general in character. The central committee of the trades unions intended a general strike, but according to the latest information reaching this correspondent, this was revoked after the speech made by Dr. von Kuehlmann, the Foreign Secretary, with which the labor leaders professed to be satisfied temporarily.

THE German press generally condemned the strike and warned the strikers that they had gone the wrong way about getting an early peace, and were instead harming their own country. Some of the papers severely rebuked the strikers. The Cologne Volkszeitung says: "We learn that the Strike Committee in Berlin had the audacity to aim a pistol at the Government's heart with a list of demands culled from the Socialist program." The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung said: "The strikes will prejudice the negotiations and encourage her enemies to resist Germany's claims." The paper also characterized the strikers as "sinning against their brothers in the field."

Some of the papers explained that the German authorities did not refuse to treat with the proper labor leaders regarding the strike. The Government took the position that on important political questions it could not negotiate with the workers and in any case with strikers.

While the suggestion was made in some quarters in England that exaggerated accounts of the strike had been circulated by the German Government in order to influence the engineers on the Clyde and other centers in England—who had threatened to lay down their tools unless the government gave satisfactory guarantees that it open peace negotiations—as well as the pacifists in the Entente countries, the general conviction was that there has been, and still was, a very considerable stoppage of work in important German war industries. In high political circles in London, according to dispatches from that city on January 31, there was a growing impression that the German authorities were endeavoring to minimize the importance of the strike, and that as little news as possible was permitted to filter through revealing the actual situation. Practically all the shipyard workers of Hamburg struck, according to the Cologne Gazette. Clergymen vainly exhorted the strikers to continue their work. The strikers proceeded to the trades union headquarters and adopted a resolution opposing the Pan-German Fatherland party, and demanding immediate peace without annexations or indemnities, better labor conditions and improvement of the food supply. The workers threatened reprisals for the arrest of their leaders. These reprisals, according to one report, have already commenced throughout the country, owing to the refusal of Herr Walraff, Minister of the Interior, to meet the strikers. Estimates of the number of persons on strike in the empire ranged as high as 1,000,000. This is believed not to be exaggerated, as in Berlin alone the figures run from 120,000, to 500,000 and 700,000 from other sources. The military authorities giving the strikers the alternative of working February 4 or facing a court-martial claimed to have the situation well in hand.

ARTHUR HENDERSON, formerly labor member in the Lloyd George cabinet, in a statement issued February first, warned Britain of labor unrest and urged the government to confer further with labor leaders before pressing its manpower bill. Mr. Henderson felt that the government would get further by adopting a more conciliatory attitude toward labor. At the same time he opposed any action by labor that would decrease the nation's striking power.

The United States government was represented in Washington dispatches as waiting, willing to encourage peace by diplomacy, but ready to make war to the hilt if necessary.

FOLLOWING the announcement on January 25 of Lord Rhondda's appeal for additional wheat exports, Herbert C. Hoover, United States Food Administrator, announced further conservation regulations in which he was backed up by a proclamation of the President. These regulations established a formula for a war bread, to be known throughout the country as "Victory bread," and prescribed that Mondays and Wednesdays be observed as wheatless days, with one wheatless meal each day; that Tuesday be observed as a meatless day, and that in addition Tuesday and Saturday be porkless days. Mr. Hoover suggested that laws making observance of his suggestions compulsory might be necessary, but declared that he thought that about ninety-five per cent. of the nation was loyally cooperating with the Food Administration. He reported that out of 18,000,000 households in the country about 13,000,000 had signed the first food pledge.

"Victory bread" is to contain at first five per cent. of other cereals than wheat, the percentage to be increased to about twenty per cent. by February 24. The government has arranged to buy thirty per cent. of all the output of the flour mills, which will be sufficient to supply the army and navy and meet the needs of our Allies and the neutrals depending on us, allowing a small surplus to be used in an emergency to prevent suffering at home. The mills have also been ordered to produce from two to four per cent. more milled flour from wheat than is produced under present milling standards. The normal consumption in the United States is about 5½ pounds per week of wheat flour per person. The ration in France is ten ounces daily, in England 4½ pounds a week, in Belgium 250 grams a day, and in Germany 350 grams a day. Some of the mills were reported as preparing to grind special war flours, to contain the proper mixture of corn and rye. Mr. Hoover was quoted as saying that while corn flour and other cereal productions should sell at a cheaper rate than wheat flour, traffic congestion had practically suspended the law of supply and demand. Mr. Hoover announced on January 28 that any unusual rise in price of "Victory bread" or the price of other productions would be made a subject of inquiry, and he also made public on the same day the new food pledge card, which will be sent to the 13,000,000 housekeepers who have allied themselves with the Food Administration and also to the other 5,000,000 who have not yet declared themselves.

The text of the food pledge card is as follows:

What You Can Do to Help Win This War

"Our problem is to feed the Allies and our own soldiers abroad by sending them as much food as we can of the most concentrated nutritive value in the least shipping space. These foods are wheat, beef, pork, butter, and sugar. Our solution is to eat less of these and as little of all foods as will support health and strength. All saving counts for victory. The Food Administration asks every loyal American to help win the war by maintaining rigidly, as a minimum of saving, the following program: "Have two wheatless days (Monday and Wednesday) in every week, and one wheatless meal in every day.

"Explanation—On 'wheatless' days and in 'wheatless' meals of other days, use no crackers, pastry, macaroni, breakfast food or other cereal food containing wheat, and use no wheat flour in any form except the small amount that may be needed for thickening soups or gravies, or for a binder in corn bread and other cereal breads. As to bread, if you bake it at home, use other cereals than wheat, and if you buy it, buy only war bread. Our object is that we should buy and consume one-third less wheat products than we did last year.

"Have one meatless day (Tuesday) in every week, one meatless meal in every day; have two porkless days (Tuesday and Saturday) in every week.

"Explanation—'Meatless' means without any cattle, hog, or sheep products. On other days use mutton and lamb in preference to beef or pork.

Victory Bread

'Porkless' means without pork, bacon, lard, or pork products, fresh or preserved. Use fish, poultry, and eggs. As a nation we eat and waste nearly twice as much meat as we need.

"Make every day a fat-saving day (butter, lard, lard substitutes, etc.).

"Explanation—Fry less. Bake, broil, boil or stew foods instead. Save meat drippings; use these and vegetable oils for cooking instead of butter. Butter has food values vital to children; therefore, give it to them. Use it only on the table. Waste no soap; it is made from fat. Be careful of all fats. We use and waste two and a half times as much fat as we need.

"Make every day a sugar-saving day. Explanation—Use less sugar. Less sweet drinks and candy containing sugar should be used in war time. As a nation we have used twice as much sugar as we need.

"Use fruits, vegetables and potatoes abundantly. Explanation—These foods are healthful and plentiful, and at the same time partly take the place of other foods which we must save. Raise all you can for home use.

"Use milk wisely. Explanation—Use all of the milk. Waste no part of it. The children must have whole milk. Use sour and skim milk in cooking and for cottage cheese.

"Hoarding food—Any one buying and holding a larger supply of food now than in peace time, except foods canned, dried or preserved in the home, is helping to defeat the Food Administration in its attempt to secure a just distribution of food and the establishment of fair prices. The food-hoarder is working against the common good and even against the very safety of the country. Hoarding food in households is both selfish and unnecessary. The government is protecting the food supply of its people.

"Loyalty in little things is the foundation of the national strength. Disloyalty in little things gives aid to the enemy. Keep the pledge. Do not limit the food of growing children. Eat sufficient food to maintain health; the nation needs strong people. Cooperate with your local and Federal Food Administrators. Take their advice.

"Preach and practice the 'gospel of the clean plate.' Housekeepers should help the stores cut down deliveries. Use local supplies; this saves railroad transportation. Report to the nearest Food Administration the name and address of any person discouraging the production or saving of food."

On the reverse side of the card are given reasons why we must save. The principal reason is that the men of the Allied nations are fighting, and they are not on the farms, and that the fields of both Allies and neutrals lack man-power, fertilizer and machinery; that the soldiers must be maintained in full strength, and that their families must not starve; that friendly neutrals must be fed, and that our own army in France must not suffer lack. We are told that the whole great problem of winning the war rests primarily on one thing: the loyalty and sacrifice of the American people in the matter of food.

Paris began to issue bread cards January 28.

Progress of the War

ITALIAN troops, on January 29, in an attack which would not be denied, broke through the Austrian line on the Asiago plateau west of the Brenta River. Although meeting with desperate resistance the Italians pressed on throughout the next three days, capturing the Col del Rosso and Monte di Val Bella, two heights to the west of the Frenzella valley south of Asiago. In the three days the Italians captured 2,600 prisoners, six guns and 100 machine guns, and restored their lines to the dominating positions which they lost in the last days of the great German-Austrian drive. Berlin claimed the capture of 675 Italians in the action. Aside from the activities on the American sector of the French front (for which see page 188) there were only patrol engagements, some more or less ambitious trench raids and artillery battles on the front from Switzerland to the sea. Air crafts were, however, unusually active on both sides, English airmen raiding Manheim, Germany, on January 24 as well as railway junctions and arsenals.

Official despatches, passed by the American Army censor in France on February 3, definitely located the sector of the battle-line, held by American forces, as on the Lorraine front, probably in the neighborhood of Nancy. Enemy shell fire, on February 2, killed two American soldiers and wounded nine.

On Monday night, January 28, German airmen paid the first compliments of the year to the city of London, being received by an almost impenetrable fire from anti-aircraft guns, and being met in the air by British fliers. Only four or five machines succeeded in reaching the city. These dropped explosive and incendiary bombs. Very little damage was done to property, but 47 persons were killed and 169 injured. One German raider was brought down. The following night another attempt was made upon the city of London, in which three persons were killed and ten injured.

German airmen also raided Paris on the night of January 30 killing 49 persons and wounding 206. One German raider was brought down. This was the first attack on Paris since July 27, 1917. French airmen replied to this attack by bombing the German airdromes on February 1st.

General Leonard Wood, in France on a tour of instruction, was slightly injured on January 27 by a bursting gun. It was suggested that General Wood would probably remain in France as a member of the Supreme Allied War Council which convened on January 29 at Versailles. General T. H. Bliss is the official representative of the American government.

The Supreme Allied War Council at its session on February 2 examined carefully the replies of Chancellor von Hertling and Count Czernin to the speeches of Premier Lloyd George and President Wilson, finding no "real approximation to the moderate conditions laid down by the Allied Governments," and decided upon a "vigorous and effective prosecution of the war until the pressure of that effort produced a change of temper in the enemy Governments justifying the hope of the conclusion of a peace based on the principles of freedom, justice and respect for international law."

Leon Trotzky, Bolshevik Foreign Minister, returned to Brest-Litovsk on January 28. The majority of the Bolsheviks were reported as in favor of a "holy" war. Trotzky returned to the peace conference with the matter of rejecting or accepting Germany's terms resting entirely in his hands.

Bolshevik troops during the week ending February 3 fought with Finnish revolutionaries against troops of the Republic. The red guard of the rebellion was on February 1st holding the capital of Finland.

The Lenine government on January 28 severed diplomatic relations with Rumania, and on January 28 Petrograd announced that in battles with the Ukrainians Bolshevik troops had taken Kiev and other towns and that a Bolsheviks' Ukrainian delegation was proceeding to Brest-Litovsk. Later Odessa and Orenburg were reported in Bolshevik hands. Rumanian troops, on February 1, at the request of the inhabitants, occupied the Bessarabian city of Kishineff.

Trotzky announced on January 30 that the treaty between England and Russia whereby Persia became merely a sphere of influence for the two powers had been abrogated.

During the week, ending January 26, U-boats sunk nine British vessels of more than 1,600 tons and six of less.

The Week in the World's News

STORMS EMBARGO FREIGHT. On the second of the Fuel Administration's workless Mondays, the storm king again asserted his superior authority. Throughout the Alleghenies a blizzard raged, affecting particularly the Pennsylvania lines east of Pittsburg, which, by the utmost efforts, finally opened a single track by the end of the day. The movement of coal, food and every other kind of freight was practically at a standstill throughout the whole territory between the mountains and the Hudson, in which the greatest congestion existed. In West Virginia moderating weather brought with it flooded rivers, the main line of the Norfolk and Western suffering considerable damage. The Ohio River also started on its annual spring spree, doing some $200,000 worth of damage to barges and packets. One advantage of government operation of the railroads was shown markedly in West Virginia and throughout the Eastern territory in the working out of an order which impressed into the work of freeing the snow-clogged yards a considerable number of men from other branches of the railway work and from the mines. Over 1,100 miners, made idle by the blocking of transportation, were put to work shoveling snow. Notwithstanding all the handicaps, some progress was made in the congested terminals of the East. The coaling of ships was expedited, and on January 30 only 29 ships were delayed in New York Harbor for lack of coal, although there were said to be more than 400 ships in port. The orders of the Fuel Administration were made somewhat more rigid on this Monday, and it was reported that the compliance of the public was more complete as the order became more clearly understood. Production of coal in the bituminous fields was curtailed 16,000,000 tons by storm conditions in January. It was announced on February 1, that Monday, February 4, might be the last of the enforced holidays, although fuel would continue to go first to the preferred consumers.

INCENDIARIES AID ENEMY. The great 4,500-foot government pier, under construction in Newark, N. J., harbor, was fired by incendiaries on January 26, the incendiaries returning the fire of guards in making their escape. The pier, along with some buildings under erection for the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, was destroyed, the damage being estimated in the neighborhood of $1,000,000. Only the most strenuous efforts kept the fire from spreading to the adjoining shipyards, where preparations are under way for the building of 150 steel ships.

EXPLOSION KILLS TWELVE. An accidental explosion of fulminate of mercury in Magazine No. 2 at the Newport News Torpedo Station on January 26 wrecked three of the bombproof buildings used for the drying of detonators, killing twelve workmen and injuring seven.

GOOD-BY LOBBYIST. Director General of Railroads McAdoo on January 27 issued an order requiring the railroads of the country to cut from their payrolls all persons employed in any way to affect legislation, all persons not actually engaged in the performance of necessary legal work, all payment of expense of associations of carriers not approved by the Director General, and all payment of any moneys to influence elections or legislation. Free passes were forbidden except as expressly authorized by the Interstate Commerce laws. It was anticipated that this order would result in the saving of several millions of dollars a year.

CORPORATION TO FINANCE WAR. Secretary McAdoo on January 28 made public a bill prepared at his direction to create a war finance corporation, with a capital stock of $500,000,000, all of which was to be subscribed by the United States. The proposed corporation would have power to make advances to any bank, banker or trust company which has outstanding loans necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to make similar advances to persons, firms and associations whose operations are necessary for the prosecution of the war, and to subscribe for and deal in the bonds of the United States. The corporation would have the power to issue bonds or obligations in an amount not in excess of $1,000,000,000. Under the law as proposed, the corporation would have the power of investigating, licensing or refusing to license officers of securities exceeding $100,000 at par.

ORGANIZING DELIVERIES. Two announcements were made on January 30 of measures calculated to speed up the delivery of goods and necessary materials to eastern ports and the transportation of these across the Atlantic. The Food Administration and the Director General of railways arranged for the assembling of loaded cars at Chicago, East St. Louis, Pittsburg and Buffalo, the cars to be made into solid trains and shipped through on fast freight schedules. To avoid the cumbersome and slow methods, adequate in peace times, of carrying merchandise from the railroad piers on lighters to ships anchored in midstream, it was also arranged to run these loaded cars on to the railroad piers and to berth the ships alongside. Arrangements were made for the simultaneous loading of 25 ships, the usual number included in a convoy. A ship control committee was also created representing the Shipping Board, War and Navy departments, Food and Fuel Administrations, the Director General to France, Secretary Baker said, depended largely upon ships.

GERMAN SHIPS AMERICAN TRANSPORTS. It was announced on January 29 from the debarkation port in France, that sixteen former German ships had just reached that port after an eventless trip. The ships, including the former Vaterland, now the Leviathan, and fifteen others of the North German Lloyd and Hamburg American liners, all of which had been completely repaired and placed in service. The army transport system is reported to be carrying each month 70,000 troops and their supplies to France. It was announced on the preceding day that in the twelve months of unrestricted submarine warfare 69 American vessels totaling 171,061 tons had been sunk with a loss of more than 300 lives. The former German and Austrian ships seized total 107 vessels with a gross tonnage of 686,494, making a net gain in the year of 515,435. In addition to these the shipping board requisitioned 426 vessels under construction in American shipyards, totaling more than 2,000,000 gross tons, and placed orders for 884 additional ships; 393 American vessels over 2,500 tons capacity were requisitioned, taken off their coastwise and South American routes and put into transatlantic service. Of the German ships seized three (3) have been successfully attacked by submarines, two being sunk, the third being beached. Great Britain lost in the year 1,169 ships, of which 763 exceeded 1000 tons capacity. The total bag of the submarines from January 1, 1917, to January 26, 1918, is given officially as 6,617,000 tons. Aside from Britain, Norway has been the heaviest loser. An officer of the Bethlehem ship building company said, on February 1, that transportation delays and the unwillingness of workmen to put in full time might reduce the output of American yards in 1918 to 3,000,000 tons.

THE CRUCIAL YEAR. President Wilson, prevented by illness from attending the Farmer's Congress at Urbana, Ill., sent his message in writing. Declaring his certainty that he needed neither to tell the farmers "that we are as a nation in the presence of a great task which demands supreme sacrifice and endeavor of every one of us," nor to convince them that "it was necessary for us as a free people to take part in this war," the President said:—"Our national life and our whole economic development will pass under the sinister influence of foreign control if we do not win. We must win, therefore, and we shall win. . . . You will realize, as I think statesmen of both sides of the water realize, that the culminating crisis of the struggle has come and that the achievements of this year on one side or the other must determine the issue." He then called attention to the extent to which our Allies depend upon our resources and to the government agencies working with the farmers to increase our crops, declaring that we must plant wider acreages and harvest greater crops. In closing he said, "The toil, the intelligence, the energy, the foresight, the self sacrifice and devotion of the farmers of America will, I believe, bring to a triumphant conclusion this great, last war, for the emancipation of men from the control of arbitrary government and the selfishness of class legislation and control."

CUBA HUNGRY. While the needs of our Allies are holding the centre of the stage, the Food Administration is also planning measures of relief for a serious shortage of cereals and meats in Cuba. Returning travelers bring stories of real suffering and privation, reporting bread practically unknown, even in Havana.

FLIVVERS OF THE SEA. February first brought the cheering news that the great Ford plant at Detroit, the world leader in swift standardized production, had been prepared for the rapid manufacture of small destroyers, in size between the submarine chaser and the present destroyer fleet, which it would turn out at the rate of one each day after it began deliveries. The little craft have been fully standardized and have been designed with as few curved plates as possible. They will be about 200 feet long, displace about 500 tons and be driven by geared turbines. Great speed is not to be attempted, but these boats, well armed, are expected to give the submarines a knock-out blow, working with the present fleets. The parts are being shaped at the Ford plant, the boats are to be put together at Detroit and to go to sea through the Welland canal.

What of the Church?

THERE has been much discussion of late about the Church in its relation to present-day events. There can be no better basis, either for discussion or progress, than the present status of things churchly. Next week Dr. H. K. Carroll will bring to the Christian Herald Family the complete story of the Church in 1917 as it is revealed by the vital statistics.

Next week also Dr. James M. Gray, Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, begins a new series of articles on Prophecy, discussing the English Manifesto on the Second Advent.

Frank Carpenter has had of late a great deal to say about fish. Next week he brings us a whale steak and other appetizing viands.

The announcement of the cash rewards of the Second Bible Contest, which we hoped to bring you this week, was delayed by the careful verification of the checking sheets necessary to absolute justice for all contestants. The full announcement will be in next week's Christian Herald.

The Soul of Revolutionary Russia

Tcherkesoff, Prince, Philosopher, Anarchist, Tells of the Age-Long Fight for a Nation's Freedom

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

The Vladimir Cadet School, in Petrograd, set on fire during the fighting between the Bolsheviks and the forces loyal to the Provisional Government

OUT here in the Caucasus, after having come the length and breadth of Russia and seen what the American brand of anarchist can do in a state that is too confused and too ignorant to help itself, I have had the pleasure of meeting a gentle anarchist of the old school. He is what is known as a philosophical anarchist, which leads me to believe that a little sound philosophy would help our American anarchists a great deal.

He is a lovable little man, gray-brown of hair, eyes, complexion and dress. Strangers pass him by without a thought; yet many who know him look upon him as an honored friend. He is an idealist who combines with an uncompromising courage humility and tenderness. Prince among the Georgians, he is a true democrat, whose name is known to lovers of freedom everywhere as "Tcherkesoff."

He gave himself to the revolutionary cause the year the Russian serfs were freed. He went in on the "ground floor" and has been doing business at the old stand ever since. Never has he given up the fight. Nor has he fought the air.

The Prince, the Professor and I have had several good talks together, here in this cosmopolitan city where Armenians, Georgians, Tartars, Persians and Chinese live together in unity and concord. But the capstone of our enjoyment came when we went with the prince to his native land of Kakhétia, which he had not seen for years.

A FOUR hours' wait kept us from entering the lovely Alasan valley until night had settled down, and the next day heavy clouds hid the long 14,000-foot range of the Great Caucasus, which separates Kakhétia from the sheltered valleys of Daghestan, "an island in a sea of history." As we rode up from the station, between the famed Kakhétian vineyards, to the lovely little city of Telav, two military officers, with whom we were forced to ride because of a shortage of carriages, asked the name of the little old man who had taken the seat beside the driver. Humbly, but perhaps with a touch of expectation in his voice, our friend mentioned his name.

"I am ashamed to be riding here in the best seat when you are up there," was the reply. This was the greeting of the prodigal to his beloved home. Prodigal in strength, in ambitions to have great Russia free, in unselfish suffering for a worthy cause, the great revolutionist found in the tone of voice of a trim young officer a reward for his long exile.

When the host at the inn learned the name of his guest, there was nothing too good for us, and while we sat there after our cold ride and sipped steaming borsch and ate the spitted mutton which heaped up the plate, the proprietor himself in his natty tcherkeska waited upon us, jealous of the right to serve this small man who brought honor to their valley and their town. Tcherkesoff smiled happily, and pointed out the simple dignity of this humble meal, but at times a mist formed over his eyes.

In the morning we visited the home of his niece. His coming had not been announced; but when the young woman caught sight of him through the window the instant lightening of her pretty face spoke more eloquently than did her kiss of the love she bore him.

FIFTY-SIX years of fighting tyranny and then a homecoming such as this! As we wandered through the attractive town, with its old churches and its crumbling castle, our guide surveyed each familiar scene with pride. The gentle anarchist was home again and he found love there.

As we rode back through the beautiful valley of the Alasan, our companion explained something of the aims and methods of the Russian revolutionists, and made it quite clear that in Russia anarchy was both necessary and admirable, while in the United States no need for it exists.

"If the bombing of Alexander II was unjustified," he said, "then the French Revolution was unjustified and the Boston Tea Party was criminal. With freedom of expression denied them, and with despotism oppressing them; with spies in all their meetings, the Russian revolutionists had no choice but to take matters into their own hands, and rid the state of a reactionary ruler.

"In America such methods are neither justified nor necessary. Anarchy is not a revolt against proper authority, but against the crushing of humanity by an autocratic government in which they have no voice. America is not without its faults, but there are legal means for abolishing them, and the people have a voice in their own salvation. But in Russia under the Czars public opinion was not allowed expression. Under such circumstances Sophia Perovskaya and Jeliaboff did the only possible thing. Terrorism advertised freedom as milder methods could not do."

TCHERKESOFF has been a close friend of Kropotkin, Bakunin, Reclus and other famous revolutionists, and he states that these great thinkers simply advocated such principles as are embodied in American life. Kropotkin, traveling in the American West, found that a small community had provided some physical and chemical apparatus for their primary school teacher, so that she could continue her studies for a university degree, and he was delighted to see this exemplification of his own ideas.

"Anarchy in America, then," our companion continued, "is like a surgeon in a town where there is no sickness. But in nineteenth century Russia, conditions were different. Alexander II started his reign with reforms that made him popular with his people. He made certain concessions to the Poles. But the Russian nobles sought to have these welcome reforms embodied in a constitution, and the Poles started a revolution. The reformer became a reactionary, and so the revolutionary movement was born. The petitioning nobles were deported. The censorship was made more strict. Michailoff, poet and pamphleteer, was sent to hard labor, as was Nicholas Chernishevsky. A worthy and conservative revolutionary movement, which might have placed Russia in the van of freedom, was crushed with a ruthless hand. The martyrdom of these brave leaders stirred the soul of Russian youth, and the revolutionary movement spread. But Terrorism was still unthought of."

Tcherkesoff was in Moscow then, preparing for the university. But his precocity won for him a place with older men. The boy of sixteen, stirred with a love for freedom, plunged heart and soul into a struggle which has lasted all his life.

THE strictness of the censorship and the arrest of its leaders prevented the spread of liberal thought. Robbed of any means of expression, the unhappy subjects of the Czar saw the necessity for violence. The rights of mankind have advanced through revolutions. It is only in a land where there is freedom of speech and of the press that the pen is mightier than the sword.

In 1866, Karakasoff made an unsuccessful attempt to rid Russia of its cruel master. The drag-net ensnared all those who had been his friends. Tcherkesoff was imprisoned for eight months, although his only fault had been that he had been giving lessons to some workmen and their children, thus opposing the imperial will to keep the people in darkness.

Three years later, Tcherkesoff was one of a party who fought for three ideals: equality of rights, land for the emancipated serfs, and compulsory free education. This was anarchy indeed! He was sentenced to four years in the fortress which emancipated Russia should convert into a Hall of Fame in honor of the patriots who have been imprisoned there. His next punishment was deportation to Siberia.

In 1876, when the American people were celebrating a hundred years of freedom from far less tyranny than Russians were then enduring, Tcherkesoff escaped to London, where he contributed to revolutionary periodicals before going to Geneva to publish another revolutionary sheet.

In 1878 he was back in London, where he was joined in June by Prince Kropotkin. Thus began a life friendship between two whose love and gentleness are known to all.

While Tcherkesoff was in the fortress, Kropotkin and Madame Breshkovsky had been aiding in the remarkable movement of the nobility among the peasants, teaching them to read and write and think. For such anarchy four hundred young nobles were imprisoned in Petrograd at one time.

IN 1881 Sophia Perovskaya and Jeliaboff paid the price for an act which is not yet sufficiently appreciated. The explosion beside the Yekaterinski Canal, no less than the shot fired at Concord, was heard round the world. It awakened the masses in Russia as secret presses, forbidden literature and clandestine teaching had been unable to do: 1905 and 1917 were on their way.

Until 1890, however, it seemed as though the revolution was crushed. Actually, it was spreading from a class fight to a popular movement. The intellectual classes were moving ahead, aided by the presence among them of women of independence and determination. Marie, the wife of Alexander II, had provided gymnasia for women throughout Russia; women had taken an active part in the fight of the seventies; and Turgeneff's "On the Eve" had exerted a wide influence. From the forming of the three parties in 1890, the movement culminating in the revolutions of 1905 and 1917 was slow but sure. It had right behind it.

While revolutionary ideas were growing in Russia, a sinister influence which today threatens the safety of the Russian state was making itself felt. German ideas of centralization were enabled through artificial means to supplant the economic ideas of Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer and the French economists, which were held by Kropotkin, Alexander Herzen, Tchaikowsky and Tcherkesoff.

UNDER Alexander III and Nicholas II, whose chief obsession was to transmit to his heir undiminished the power he had received, the works of the French and English economists were suppressed, while the works of German authors, representing a school of thought which finds expression in the present war, were welcomed. Thus, Karl Marx was accepted as the foremost authority, with the result that the present generation of leaders, from Professor Miliukoff down, are unitarians in political outlook. Such a centralized government as these men advocate cannot be established in Russia without the use of more force than exists in any branch of existing government. Hence it is that Russia, in seeking a new form of government to supplant centralized despotism, must look to the Cossack Union, which has just taken a stand for a democratic federalized republic, rather than to the German-trained intellectuals and their astute leader for its model.

Tcherkesoff has no delusions as to the contributions Germany has made to the thought-life of the world, and in a masterly article resulting from a recent inquiry into the conditions on which a lasting peace can be established, he shows how even the great geniuses of the German people received their ideas from French and English thinkers. He, internationalist and humanitarian that he is, insists that durable peace is not possible until German militarism is crushed, the Kaiser dethroned and the doctrine of divine right relegated to the scrap-heap. But he closes his article with a typically forgiving touch:

Then the European nations, who have fought and suffered so for their independence, their political and social liberties, can forgive and forget their sacrifices and offer their hand to the German people in order that together they may realize not only peace, but fraternity and the well-being of humanity.

ANARCHIST as he calls himself, he is the one European I have met who makes the same clear distinction between the German people and its militaristic government which has been so widely proclaimed by President Wilson.

Tcherkesoff is now upholding the cause of his native Georgia, hoping for the time when it can enter a federation of Russian states, but meanwhile standing on the ancient treaty rights which Russia has never honored. Almost alone in his race, this representative of a generation before Germany's centralization theories warped Russian thought is fighting the pernicious influence of centralized authority imposed upon a people who are proud, independent and democratic. Willing to see his native land a unit in a Russian confederation, this trained agitator, in spite of his years, is doing what he can to prevent such oppression of Georgia by the New Russia as was imposed upon it by the old régime.

On one of his visits to us, I gave him some copies of the Christian Herald, one of which contained Billy Sunday's "Call to Youth." The "gentle anarchist" was delighted to read for the first time a sermon by a "fellow anarchist" of whom he had heard so much. Doubtless they are kindred spirits, this gentle opponent of political oppression and the acrobatic fighter against the strongly entrenched oppression of sin.

Among the many notable incidents of his life, I can mention only two more. In December, 1886, when Tcherkesoff was in Constantinople, he had a long talk with Hassan Fehmi Pasha, Minister of Justice, who introduced the jury system into the land of the Sultan.

"He pointed out to me then that the day was approaching when Turkey must leave Europe. He detected two great historical movements—the movement of peoples toward democracy and the movement of nations toward independence. Then he made a remarkable statement. He said that the American missionaries, such as Cyrus Hamlin and his followers, had won the confidence and love of the Turks. Kismet had decreed that the Turk must leave Europe. But who should supplant him on the hills above the Golden Horn? What Christian power should fall heir to the Mosque of Sancta Sophia? There was not one European power that Turkey could trust. But the Turk would be glad if America would send her ships and statesmen here to guarantee the neutrality of the Dardanelles and make Constantinople an independent city."

IT IS unlikely that America will ever assume the responsibility of sitting on the powder keg, while other nations sit around and smoke; but what the "gentle anarchist" was trying to make clear is that the square deal and the principle that "all men are created free and equal" will come into its own, even in the lands of the Czar and the Sultan.

It was at our last meeting in Tiflis that the indomitable optimist threw new light on his anarchism.

"Kropotkin, Reclus and myself were sitting together in London once, discussing our theories. We were taking a great deal of satisfaction in the thought that we were anarchists, who recognized no rights of coercive government.

"But," he added with a smile, "I said to them: there is one government before which we gladly bow and whose petty oppressions we willingly endure. You forget our wives."

Why Liberty Bonds Fluctuate

GOVERNMENT bonds, like people, act pretty much like one another under similar conditions. Whether they are French, English, German, Russian, Japanese, American or of any other nationality, people will act according to well established psychological traits, laughing at about the same thing, crying over similar events and manifesting fear under given situations. Corresponding to human temperament, the market value of government bonds is also subject to well defined changes, and one of the most consistent similarities of conduct which history shows to be true of them is their habit of temporarily going down on account of war.

In an enlightening article on this subject, the Liberty Loan Committee explains the cause of some of these fluctuations.

Just as consistently as history shows that government bonds go down during war, no less does it record that their usual habit has been not only to recover to their original price, but also, in many instances, to rise to a marked degree above it after the end of the war. This recovery has been manifested even by bonds of a nation suffering a severe defeat, involving serious impairment of the equity behind its bonds through the loss of national territory and through the obligation forced on it to pay the conquering nation large indemnities.

At the present writing your Liberty Bonds are quoted in the market at about 97. Taken as a detached condition, without regard to history, and looked at simply from the narrow pocketbook point of view, the fact that something you paid $100 for a short time ago will bring you only about $97 at the present moment may seem to be disquieting. But it simply means that United States bonds are now doing what the bonds of all nations do in wartime. Our bonds have depreciated to a lesser degree than most government bonds have done under similar circumstances. One instance may be cited where the bonds of a foreign government went down to almost 50 during a war; but although that nation suffered a crushing defeat and tremendous material losses, within a comparatively few years after the war was ended those same bonds went up to more than 105.

THE fact that your $100 Liberty Bond is now selling for about $97 does not in any sense imply a loss of intrinsic value nor uncertainty either as to its principal or interest. It merely implies that because of a complexity of economic factors, your government bond is normally following the way of its historic fellows. Even though Liberty Bonds have thus fluctuated to prices below par, there has been absolutely no fluctuation in the fact that the government will go on paying the promised interest on them without delay as it falls due, nor in the fact that when the time comes it will redeem them at the full face value, regardless of the ups and downs in the market quotations meanwhile.

These ups and downs in the market quotations of government bonds during wars are, in the history of nations, analogous to what the rise and fall of the thermometer is to the weather. Just as you can tell the changes in the temperature by watching the fluctuations in the height of the column of mercury, an expert in finance could almost tell the changes of a country from peace to war merely by looking at the fluctuations in the column of government bond quotations year by year. He could make a pretty fair guess that the country was at war when bond prices suddenly dropped and fluctuated below the prices of previous years, and then in succeeding years returned to their former levels or higher.

Take the case of Great Britain. Her national debt is funded in the consolidated annuities or bonds, popularly known as "Consols." The fluctuations of these consols in response to England's wars, big and little, are typical of the conduct of government bonds. The Boer War of 1899-1901 brought on a marked drop in consols. In 1899 the high was only 111½, the low 97¾; in 1900 they swooped down to 103½ for the high, 96¾ for the low; and in 1901 still downward to 97¾ for the high, 91 for the low. In 1914, however, a slight upward tendency appeared, but it was arrested by the outbreak of the present war. In 1913 the high for consols was 75 9/16, the low 71 1/16; in 1914 the high had gone up to 80¾ in the peaceful part of the year, but a low point of 68 was registered that year on account of the war. In 1915 the highest point was only 76½ and the low was down to 54, while in 1916 the high was 62¼ and the low only 50. In 1917 the high was 56¾, the low 51.

THE history of French Government bonds, or rentes, shows similar war reactions on their part. As in England, the French Government debt is mainly in the form of a perpetual funded debt. In 1830 French rentes were above par, going in that year to 102. The July Revolution of 1831 caused a sharp decline to 84. But this was only comparatively temporary, for by 1845 the 5 per cent. rentes were selling at 122.85; the 4's at 110.5; and the 3's at 86.4. The Revolution of 1848 caused the 5's to drop to 50, and the 3's to 32½. After that there came a steady upward tendency until 1867, when the 3's reached 75.10. Then came the disastrous Franco-Prussian War, 1870-71. The 3's dropped to 50.35. In the period subsequent to this, although France had been defeated, losing Alsace-Lorraine and having to pay a billion dollar indemnity to Germany, and although there were two funding operations reducing the interest rate, nevertheless the price of France's bonds continued to rise until in 1897 they reached their maximum of 105.25. The present war, true to precedent, has again sent them plunging downward. In 1914 the high was 88, the low 76.5. In 1917 the range was 55.5 to 53.25.

Prussian bonds also reflected and registered the transit of the Franco-Prussian War. In 1869 the bonds of the Prussian debt were quoted at 81¾; in 1870 they went down to 78½. But Prussia's bonds showed a rapid recovery in keeping with the rapidity of her military success, rising in 1871 to 83¼ and in 1872 to 90½. Germany in this war won Alsace-Lorraine and $1,072,237,873 in indemnities, being enabled to wipe out her debt with a half billion dollars to spare, so that the disturbing effect of war on her bonds was minimized. They have felt, however, the full effect of the present war; in 1914 Prussian 4's recorded a high of 86 and a low of 81; in 1915 the high was 65¼, the low 52¾; and in 1916 the high was 58¾ and the low 50¼. Other German Government bond issues show corresponding downward fluctuations.

VARIOUS issues of United States Government bonds showed similar fluctuations during the Civil War. The United States 6's of 1868 were quoted at a high in 1860 of 109½, and a low of 96. In 1861, the first year of the war, their high was only 100, and the low was 86. In 1862 they partially recovered, the high being 107½, the low 85. The 5's of 1865 also dipped. Their high price in 1860 was 103, in 1861 it was 92, in 1862 it was 99 and in 1863 it was 127; the low quotations followed a parallel course.

In their present market quotations below par, United States Liberty Bonds are simply following the trait of their kind as they normally might be expected to do. By the same token, after the war is over, there is no reason to expect otherwise than that they will return to par and then go above par. More than this, in their present comparatively slight depreciation they are showing typical American stability. Instead of falling only two or three points below par they might have dropped ten or fifteen points without exhibiting a fluctuation as violent as has been shown by the bonds of other less wealthy nations which have finally soared many points above par.

MORE than $320,000 was saved by the Post Office Department by use of motor trucks during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917. There were 774 routes. In one of the cities where trucks were operated, the trucks were scheduled to make 384,526 trips, and there were only 132 failures.

Services of 400 motor vehicles are required for transportation and distribution of American Red Cross supplies in France, according to the War Council of the Society. 250 motor trucks handle 350 tons daily at French ports. In Paris 200 tons are received daily, of which 125 tons are delivered to warehouses at other cities and along the front from the North Sea to Switzerland. The Society is to operate motor lines through Switzerland from the French to the German border to transport repatriated soldiers.

Long or Short Sermons?

ARE we drifting back to the old fashion of long sermons? It would almost seem so. The average sermon in city pulpits is somewhat briefer than the discourses we hear from pulpits in the country; but this is probably due to more time being devoted to the musical part of the service in the city churches. Yet, taken as a whole, the sermonic average is little short of forty minutes. A religious contemporary tells how William Jennings Bryan, in a recent address, related his experience at a meeting at Harvard. He asked the chairman how long he was expected to speak and was told that there was no limit; "but," the chairman added, "our faculty has gone over the records of all the speakers we have listened to and found that none of them said anything after the first twenty minutes!" Mr. Bryan saw the point and presumably took the hint.

The great temptation to pastors is to keep on speaking after they have delivered their message. It is fatal to many a good preacher's oratorical reputation to yield in such a case, because unless, besides possessing the natural gift of eloquence, he has the very best reason for going on, he should stop when he is through, instead of risking an anti-climax and losing the interest of his audience. Some ministers are so much in love with their own orotund voices that they "let themselves out" at every opportunity. We have known many cases where hints, pulling of watches and other signs of impatience were unavailing; the speaker would keep right on ascending in glowing spirals until his eloquence took him up over the treetops and he couldn't be coaxed down until he had spun out the last resounding sentence.

"I would not have preachers torment their hearers and detain them with long and tedious preaching," was Luther's advice, and in these days of universal urge and drive, it is even more applicable than when he gave it.

General Pershing on Army Morals

IT was a cruel and ill-advised indictment which the Church Board of Temperance of a leading denomination brought against our officers and troops in France, in one of its publications recently. Even if it had been true that our men had yielded to temptation, it would have been a wiser and more considerate course for the denomination in question, instead of proclaiming unverified charges to the American public, to have submitted them to the Washington authorities, who would have been compelled, by the very nature of the case, to take drastic steps to correct whatever might have been wrong.

But the whole fabric of the accusation has been demolished at a single stroke by General Pershing's report to the Secretary of War, to whom the charges were referred. In less than one hundred words, he punctures the tissue of exaggerations and sets the truth in the case in so clear a light that every father and mother in America will be grateful to him for what he has written. Here is his statement:

"There has never been a similar body of men who have led as clean lives as our American soldiers in France. They have entered this war with the highest devotion to duty and with no other idea than to perform their duties in the most efficient manner possible. . . . Forbidden the use of strong drink and protected by stringent regulations against sexual evils, and supported by their own moral courage, their good behavior is the subject of most favorable comment, especially by our Allies."

General Pershing is a commander in whom not only the President but the whole nation has confidence, and he knows what he is writing about. His word alone could stand without need of corroboration; but voluntary testimony in support of it has come from high sources among our Allies. Captain Arthur Radcliffe Dugmore of the British army in France, who reached the United States a few days ago, fresh from his inspection of the American divisions in France, has this to say on the subject:

The percentage of crime, as we refer to all misdemeanors in military life, is practically nil. Official records show the percentage of vice disease among the American troops is 3¼ in every thousand; a percentage lower than ever has been recorded by any army in the world. The spirit of the men could not be better and things are going along in splendid shape.

Thus falls to the ground, discredited and stamped as a cruel falsehood, the story which represented our boys as having become drunken and debauched, and that our government was indifferent to such a situation. From an enemy source, such a story would have been monstrous and incredible, knowing what we do about the extreme precautions the government has taken to shield our new national army from such perils at home and abroad; but coming from the source whence it originated, it is incomprehensible.

Systematic Self-Denial

THE fixing of certain days to be heatless, wheatless and meatless is a measure not so much for the saving of the coal, wheat and meat as for the equitable distribution of them.

Without these regulatory measures, there would be no more of these necessities than there is with them. Without them, there would be more for some and less or none for others. Without them, the rich would be comfortable while the poor would perish, and many unessential industries would fatten while the production of many necessary commodities would be paralyzed.

The food and fuel administrators offer no guarantee that this enforced self-denial will bring about universal comfort, but they do promise to reduce discomfort to a minimum and to equalize it upon all sections of the country and all classes of the people.

It is a time of unavoidable privations. The condition is one under which we all must help to bear one another's burdens. This help is very well when it is voluntary and occasional, but it is infinitely better when systematic and general. Voluntary food and fuel conservation has not failed. It has achieved many beneficial results. The great majority of the tradesmen and of the people have followed in the most patriotic manner the suggestions of the Federal administrators. But there is always to be found in any such movement a minority low in public spirit and sluggish in conscience. It would seem as though we never could hope to eliminate selfishness, no matter what the stress may be upon a common public effort.

This explains why Congress feels called upon to grant to the fuel and food administrators additional powers for fixing penalties upon the violators of their regulations. The country as a whole has been schooled and practiced up to this completed step in the process. The vast and patriotic majority indorse and abide by the wise regulations, and the small and selfish minority should be forced to fall in line.

The Ascendancy of Labor

NEARLY two generations have passed since a crabbed old philosopher, with the indomitable soul of a prophet in a feeble frame, wrote a book which mightily shook the larger portion of the English-speaking world and set the minds of Europe and America to serious thinking. Many writers before him had dealt with the same impressive topic—the emancipation of labor—for it is a theme as old as the pyramids. But Thomas Carlyle, when he unlimbered his batteries in "Past and Present," gave a new aspect to the fight which has been increasing in intensity and widening in significance with the passage of the years. With a vocabulary that swept along like a Niagara torrent, he assailed the entrenched forces of wealth and privilege and revealed to the England of his time the injustices and oppressions that were laid upon labor. "Two men I honor," he wrote, "the man who works with his hands and he who works with his brain—these two and no other." To him, all honest work was sacred and all unproductive idleness a crime against God's plan for the welfare of the world. More than any other voice in that day, he held up the House of Lords as an outworn absurdity which should be dispensed with.

That was many years ago and England never quite forgave the irascible old pedagogue for the shaking-up he had administered. Today, we have the evidence that Carlyle was more than a political pamphleteer—he was a prophet. Only a few weeks ago, the British Labor party—now a power in the empire—echoed the demand for the abolition of the House of Lords, with an emphasis that, could he only have heard it, would have made Carlyle feel that his long battle for labor had not been fought in vain.

That the outcome of the world-war may mark the beginning of a new social and economic era is the impression of thoughtful observers in Europe and America today. Charles M. Schwab, who from a workman's daily task has risen to the presidency of a great corporation, on a public occasion lately said:

"The time is coming when the men of the working class will control the destiny of this world of ours. The Bolshevik sentiment must be taken into consideration. In the very near future we must look to the worker for a solution of economic conditions now being considered. We are at the threshold of a new social era. This new order of things may work great hardship for many of us. It is going to come upon us sooner than we expect. It is social renaissance of the whole world. Some people call it Socialism; others call it Bolshevism. It means but one thing, and that is that the man who labors with his hands, who does not possess property, is the one who is going to dominate the affairs of this world; not merely Russia, Germany, and the United States, but the whole world. This great change is going to be a social adjustment. I repeat that it will be a great hardship to those who control property, but perhaps in the end it will work estimably to the good of us all. Therefore, it is our duty not to oppose, but to instruct, to meet and to mingle with the view of others. The translation from the old to the new order of things will be so gradual that we will hardly realize that it has occurred."

Many Americans who are watchful of the signs of the times note the indications of coming changes that are foreshadowed in many lands. The right of the people to regulate their own affairs and choose their own government is now being boldly asserted where before it could not even be whispered. How hard it has been to get the world to accept this doctrine! In the coming readjustment the workers—the common people, of whom Lincoln said that "God must love them since he made so many of them"—may at last come into their own.

What an opportunity is here open to the Church of Christ to bridge the chasm which divides it from labor, and to become the great meliorative influence in the coming period of reconstruction after the war!

One by One

HOW many converts Christ made through his sermons to the multitudes we do not know, but we do know that some of his grandest triumphs occurred while conversing with a single individual. When he wanted a man for his historian and biographer, he called Matthew. One little sentence turned the tide in a publican's life. Why did Matthew follow him so quickly? It may be he saw the quiet authority and majesty in Jesus' face and heard the gentle kindness and sympathy in his voice, as grace was poured from his lips. He was charmed, fascinated, and left his counting-desk for the mission of counting mercies, honors and riches for all the ages.

Jesus sought men rather than masses. He had interviews with outcasts, one by one. He seemed in no hurry, though he had only three years for his ministry. He could wait at the well for the conversion of a woman who would bring all the townspeople to hear him. The first disciples followed his example. Andrew brought his brother, Simon Peter, to Jesus. On the same day, our Lord findeth Philip and Philip findeth Nathanael, and said, "Come and see Jesus!" Nicodemus followed Nathanael and listened to a sermon recorded in the third chapter of John's Gospel, that has filled the world with glory.

Just as atoms communicate the forces of nature by touching each other until the whole is electrified, so soul atoms touch each other till a world of beings are thrilled with divine power.

When our Lord wanted a missionary to the Gentile world, he came personally to Paul, called him, saved him, sent him, and he became the greatest among the apostles. Winning one is the way to win the race of mankind. We win men one at a time for the sake of gold, honor, ambition and power, but how few try to win a single individual for his soul's sake and for the sake of our Lord!

Truth the Common Ground

SECRETARY OF WAR BAKER has silenced his critics by announcing the surprising achievements of his department; but instantly and naturally there arises the question, Why had these important facts been so long withheld, especially from Congress?

The task before our government is one that calls for all its resources of brain and spirit. It is a task not for one department or for several departments but for all the departments and for every bit of man power in them all. To work together most effectively they all must work in common knowledge of the truth.

Secretiveness naturally gives rise to all sorts of cross-purposes, far-fetched fancies, baseless fears and wild criticisms wide of the mark. The truth concentrates and harmonizes purposes, coordinates efforts, creates confidence and admits of only criticism that is definite and constructive.

There is danger in certain facts reaching the enemy, of course; but there are graver possibilities still in important truths being withheld from responsible departments of our own government.

Trans-Australian Railroad

THE United States, Canada, Russia and Argentina are crossed by rail from east to west, and Australia is to be added to the number now that the Augusta-Kalgoorlie road is being finished. The distance covered by this new road will be equal to that from Boston to San Francisco. In the United States the extent of transportation from Boston to San Francisco is 3,467 miles. In Canada from Halifax to Vancouver by the Canada Pacific is 3,656 miles. In Russia from Vladivostok to Petrograd by the Trans-Siberian road and between Moscow and the capital is 5,785 miles. In South America from Buenos Aires to Valparaiso is 908 miles. This new road in Australia from Brisbane to Perth will be 3,467 miles in length. Only a comparatively little time ago railroads were never dreamed of. The vehicle hitched to a horse had no improvement made in transportation for six thousand years till comparatively recently. Now the earth is literally girdled with steel rails, and the people are racing in cars back and forth over the continents. The railroads are built in the interest of commerce, but the Kingdom of Christ is using them to carry light and evangelism to the ends of the earth. The trans-continental systems are helping to fulfil this prophecy: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth." (Ps. 72 : 8.)

Revolver Was a Finger

A NEWLY married young man of twenty-two in a large city the other day visited four stores, and holding up the employees robbed the cash drawer. The way he held the cashiers up was to point his long forefinger out as though it were a pistol and threaten to blow their brains out if they did not deliver the money. They were so terror-stricken that they offered no resistance. At the last place the man was caught and taken to jail. What humor the man projected into his mean burglary! What cowardice the custodians of the funds showed, and what a mockery and curse of a bridegroom this young man was! Christ in teaching by contrast one of the greatest lessons of life thus refers to a thief with murder in his heart: "The thief cometh not but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy." (John 10 : 10.)

Threats Frighten Debtors

MOESCHA R—, a jeweler on Long Island, recently concluded to go out of business. Thousands of dollars of bad debts had accumulated on his books, and as he desired to move away from the town he took this novel plan of collecting those bills. He did not say in the paper that he was selling out and leaving town and trusted that the people who had owed him money so long would call and settle, but put the following unique advertisement in a local news-in a happy mood, as not a mortal in it owed him a cent. Thousands of merchants fail because many of their customers are slow pay or no pay at all. Some of these merchants are partly to blame themselves, for they are so anxious to sell the goods that they are too easy with their credits. Debt is a dangerous thing. The dishonest man will throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest." (Matt. 18 : 28.)

Telegram Took Eleven Years

A FEW days ago the London Chronicle received the following letter: "I beg to acknowledge your dispatch to me January 22, 1906, thus taking eleven years to cover fifty yards." This is the explanation covering the delay: At that period telegrams were placed in a chute leading from the receiving room to the counter for delivery, and it appears that on its way the telegram slipped into a crevice of the woodwork and hid there for eleven years. A post office engineer making some repairs rescued the message from its imprisonment. It does not take eleven years or eleven seconds to send a message from earth to heaven, from a human heart to the heart of God. Wireless telegraphy is slow by the side of

Reindeer Take Milk to Babies

CHICAGO, like the other cities, was hit very hard by the snowstorm. A twelve-inch fall was followed by a ten-inch fall, making nearly two feet on the level. The snow was thrown by the winds into drifts which in some places were impassable. Motor cars and all wheeled vehicles were driven off the road. The most acute and immediate problem that confronted the city was getting milk to the babies to keep them from suffering or starving. Mr. Frank Clements concluded that this would be a good time to try his team of beautiful reindeer and his sleigh, and to put them to benevolent use. And so he drove to the homes of the plain and poor people and carried milk to the babies. That was a beautiful and Christly thing to do. Christ taught the world how to treat babies. Heathenism has through all the centuries been heartless to the child. When Greece and Rome were at the height of their glory and civilization they had such a poor opinion of childhood that they often treated it with contempt, and when the child was weak or deformed or crippled in any way they did what they thought was the sensible thing, put it out of its misery by killing it. God's true idea of childhood got into the Hebrew mind, and among the Jews the child had an important place in the family and state. But it was only when Christ came that childhood was elevated to the place where it belongs, and each year his idea is being more deeply written into our civilization. The child is the monarch. Everything must serve it. If it is weak or sick or deformed or crippled, service for it is of paramount importance. If there is danger the babies must be rescued first; if there is hunger they must have the first food. If there is a snowstorm and there is difficulty in getting food the babies must have milk. Milk as food for babies is thus used by the apostle to illustrate a spiritual truth: "As unto babes in Christ I have fed you with milk, and not with meat." (1 Cor. 3 : 1-2.)

the communication of a redeemed soul with the Holy Spirit. Moses talked with God, and every one who is sincere will find him ready to hear. What thought for the New Year more impressing? God is so near to his children that they do not have to send him letters or telegrams. They can speak to him at any time as their Friend and Saviour. And Christ has given us the blessed assurance that what we ask for in faith shall be granted. We read this in the earliest history of the race, when the children of Israel heard the voice of God on Mount Sinai: "We have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth." (Deut. 5 : 24.)

Less Loafing, More Business

MAYOR HYLAN, the executive of New York City, has just issued the following order: "All city employees working in public offices shall refrain from smoking, reading newspapers, or wearing their hats during office hours. The utmost courtesy must be accorded to the public by the employees in their daily transactions." Many of the employees are diligent and courteous as well as competent, but some think the job carries with it the right to be loungers and loafers, and to be insolent in the exercise of their petty authority. Now that the new mayor has issued his order of politeness and diligence to those on the inside of the building, it will be well for him to issue an order to the police force outside to execute the law honestly and fearlessly against all forms of vice and crime. Diligence in business which the mayor's order requires is thus demanded as a religious duty: "Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord." (Rom. 12 : 11.)

paper: "I shall publish the name and exact address and vocation of each of the aforementioned dead beats, giving in my usual style a psychological treatise on their character and makeup. The paper goes to press at 10.30 A.M., and all who are anxious to have their character defined in print should not settle their accounts before that time." Immediately creditors began to appear and pay their bills, and for a whole week up to the moment of going to press the store was thronged with delinquents and the proprietor had little time for much else than receipting the bills long overdue. Men who had bought engagement rings on credit, and others who had purchased presents that they did not care to have published, all paid up. The jeweler said that he was able now to leave town be careless of his obligations and will often get credit on purpose to dead-beat the merchant. But honest people often get into the slovenly habit of having everything "charged," much more than they need, and then having a hard time in paying for it. A good rule for beginners and even for older persons is to buy what there is the money to pay for. It is downright dishonesty to go in debt without the probability or certainty of payment. But what of the moral obligations to God and our fellow men which have not been met? What mercy will be needed when the time of their settlement comes? The Hebrew of Glen Cove dealt with his debtors in as summary a manner as the man in the parable: "And he laid hands on him, and took him by the

Fuller Meanings of the Incarnation

A SERMON BY REV. S. PARKES CADMAN, D.D.*

TEXT—John 1: 14. "The Word Became flesh."

THESE are four simple words, yet they are as profound as simple, summarizing and giving new direction to ages of thought. The prophets of Judaism, the philosophers of Greece, daring speculators like Philo, had dealt with the connecting link between an All-Creating Deity and the work of His hands. The Greek spoke of this link as the Logos, by which he meant the Divine Reason, Idea, Intention, expressed first in the material universe and then in the mind of man. The Apostle crowns the order and adds the third and determinant expression. In Jesus Christ, our Lord and Redeemer, says this Prologue of St. John's Gospel, "the Word became flesh." Evidently such a statement was impossible to Plato, to Philo, to anyone who had not known Jesus as St. John tells us here he had known Him. And when we ask just what the Apostle meant, there are those who urge the question is superfluous. Rest content, they say, with the revelation as it stands, conscious that the Incarnation is the keystone of the arch of Christian truth, and humbly, reverently grateful for its blessings, without attempting to look into mysteries which are beyond us. Enough that God in Christ is everlasting love, and that we have redemption through Him, even the salvation of our souls.

But this first chapter of St. John's Gospel does not favor such an acquiescence. It tells us very boldly, plainly, that the highest purpose of God was revealed in human flesh, and that the act was complete, definite, visible, in Jesus as the Christ. What nature could not contain, notwithstanding its vastness and splendor; what the mind of man, viewed as a collective whole, did not suffice to hold, personally lodged in the physical being of Mary's Son, fully received and adequately displayed. Let us suppose that these great and sacred words could be paraphrased, would they not run after this fashion?

FROM the beginning, the duration behind all the epochs of time, God had an Intention, divine and holy as Himself. All things were created and sustained by the outworkings of this Intention. Yet when they were accomplished, this yearning for self-manifestation went beyond them. The worlds on worlds that peopled space could not disclose to Him what they did not have. Love, righteousness, reason, are the essentials of spiritual fellowship, and these were not conveyed by matter, whatever its bulk or its beauty. Hence God went further, infinitely further, when He gave His own life to man, made in His image and for His glory. The heart and mind which in us bespeak their Maker were the light of that life. And none wish to deny or belittle the wonders they have wrought. Yet they were imperfect, crippled by sin and operated in the darkness, which could not comprehend their significance. Then, as a final, a cumulative act, God's Intention became flesh, and flashed forth in the Word which had breath, and worked with human hands the creed of creeds, that all men may know that this was the Only Begotten One of the Father, the Logos Eternal, full of grace and truth.

If this is an acceptable exposition of the realities with which this chapter deals, there can be but one main conclusion to be drawn from them, and that is, the fleshly robe which Jesus wore was God's chosen medium for His mission. The Deity was not veiled in flesh, as one of our Christmas carols sings; He was made known in it; not hidden, still less extinguished, but revealed to the adoring gaze of His rejoicing offspring.

THE man who wrote this Gospel, like his fellow disciples, had been nurtured in a strictly monotheistic religion. To him, as to them, the deification of any man would once have been an abomination of polluted heathenism. Yet they worshiped Jesus, and spoke of Him as being one with the Father. Moreover, their faith and worship have been the fountain of pure Christianity. Without their overmastering conception of the Master as preeminent in all things our religion would not have existed today. But this is also noticeable, that it was the lowly human Jesus, the Babe of Bethlehem, the Boy at Nazareth, the Carpenter in his shop, the Peasant Teacher, the poverty-stricken Wanderer of Palestine, who began this process in them. Its mainspring was their conviction that God could be mediated through a human personality, that even the physical basis of our life was in closest touch with the Deity.

And is not this a rational inference? I find the Father, if I find Him at all, in human love at work among the common necessities of our earthly state. Not in the stars, not in the silent forces which bind them together, not in the dreams and ideals of the mortal mind, so much as in the domestic circle, in the routine service of the home by parent and child, is true divinity to be recognized. There is more demonstration of God's love in a mother bending over her first born son than in the elaborated logic of theologians. Both are of the flesh, mother and son, but it is flesh that bleeds, suffers, goes forth to labor and to endure; flesh which is charged with the racial continuance. And this, said the Apostle, is the actual transparent garb of the Highest.

PERHAPS some to whom this idea is not familiar may find in it a limit of grossness. There is no grossness in the flesh which is not implanted there by a corrupted spirit. Of itself, the body is the temple of the Holy 'host, the shrine of the Incarnate God. Superstition has conspired against it, blamed it for every spiritual disaster, every moral blindness, made it the seat of vice, the throne of iniquity. If you want to be a saint, said the monastics, cease to be a man; and in striving to be more than men, they ended in being less than men. Esoteric and pagan cults rose in bitter opposition to the claims of the body and passed on their opposition to ecclesiastical organizations. The physical nature was campaigned against, denounced, vilified. Ascetics abjured marriage, despised the family, preached sexual hate and discord. Jesus had given them no leeway. He honored marriage by entering upon His ministry through the garlanded gate at Cana. He rebuked the officious followers who endeavored to keep the children from Him, and graciously bestowed His benediction on these living tokens of natural affection. He warned the complacent ones that unless they, too, became as little children, they could not enter into His Kingdom. By His own entrance upon this plane, His regard for His Mother, His observance of domestic attachments and responsibilities, He gave the future Church an example she would have been wise to follow. Notwithstanding, for centuries her best blood was drained off into the cloister. Fanatical devotees preached bodily filth and starvation and mutilation, wore their low shirts, lived on pillars and in caves and dens of the earth. Theological heresies embodied their notions, and the idea spread that the humanity of Jesus was in likeness, but not in essence, as our own.

In contradiction of this, the New Testament dwells on the physical features of His appearance, and how that He grew daily in stature and in wisdom, and experienced weariness and pain. What He had come to do was not to be done by dreaming. Human sin could not be purged away by thinking on its problems, any more than the Panama Canal could be dug by making plans on blue paper. The uplifting of the world required Christ's birth, crucifixion, death, all that this mortal frame can bear of agony and tribulation. It was in this sense that the Word was made flesh; that men beheld His glory—the glory of work, of ill-requited effort, of utmost sacrifice. Jesus ahungered, athirst, forspent; Jesus weeping at the graveside; Jesus feeding the multitude; Jesus preparing food on the lake shore for His disappointed disciples, is the Jesus who has won the hearts of men, because He was most divine when He was most human.

WHAT are the practical lessons in our day, when men are marching to the front selected for their physical efficiency? Certainly so much as this: that you are not less but more spiritual because you have a healthy body. Your fleshly side can be holy, your meat and drink can be sanctified, nature itself can be everywhere interpreted in the light of the Incarnation. St. Paul insists that it waits, captive, but eagerly expectant, for the moral freedom of the sons of God to also set it free from defilement and purposelessness.

In the modern era, science has abolished the false idealisms I have mentioned. We do not pride ourselves on seclusion, dirt, maceration, nor mistake, I trust, mutilation for consecration. Rather do we exalt the surgeon's skillful knife, the sanitary engineer's admirable protection against disease. The world must be freed of dirt and disease as surely as of war and pestilence. God still manifests Himself in the gospel of social betterment, the destruction of the slum, of the fever-breeding tenements, of the vile haunts in which His children perish for lack of understanding. What are these crusades but an extended meaning of the Incarnation?

LASTLY, Jesus kept His body beyond the Resurrection, although it was a transformed body. "Feel me," said He to the doubting disciples; "I have hands and feet, I can still speak and be heard, show myself to you and be known." The five senses in them and in us are the doors through which angels pass. Close them and you become an imbecile; stuff them up with iniquitous pursuits and scenes, and your soul withers and decays within. Flesh and spirit working harmoniously in the grace of God, toward a steadfast mind in a healthy frame, are the items in the program of the Incarnation which you should faithfully fulfil. The radiance which shown on the face of the transfigured Jesus has a right to shine on the face of every man, woman and child He came to save. "Save the soul first," you say. Nay! save the whole man! and all belonging to him; save society! save your neighborhoods! save the State! by driving lust, drink, uncleanness, greed, oppression and war out of existence.

The regeneration of the world on its upper and lower sides is the task of the Church, toward which she proceeds in the strength of the Incarnate Christ, until "Holiness to the Lord" is written on the bells of the horses, and the joy of His control is felt by things visible and invisible.

ABOUT twelve months ago a letter was received asking the Department for Utilizing Surplus Material of the World's Sunday School Association to send a gift of raffia which would be used in teaching basketry among the blind at Ranchi, India. A small gift of money had been received, which was invested in a few pounds of raffia. A letter received from the missionary who made the request tells of the war casualty. "I have just had word from the shipping company saying that the boat bearing the raffia was torpedoed and the raffia was lost. I am so sorry to tell you this after all the trouble you had in getting it for my blind boys and girls. We had been looking forward to doing many things with it. When I told the children about our loss, one of them asked at once, 'Was any one drowned?'"

I was glad to find that they were not only thinking about their own loss, but also about the lives of others." A second order of raffia was started on its journey across the seas. This Department has hundreds of appeals, from a picture card to an automobile.

THE American branch of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, acting jointly with the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, has prepared a four weeks' course of study on World Reconstruction for use of members of churches. It is entitled "A New Era in Human History," and is designed for discussion groups, Bible classes, men's and women's clubs, and young people's societies. Rev. Sidney L. Gulick is the secretary, and the headquarters are at 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York.

THE Panayan Sunday School Association in the Philippines has increased from 5,000 two years ago to 15,000. In the same time the Sunday school membership of the provinces of Bulacan has increased from 2,500 to 8,000 with 2,000 additions to the church.

Among the Workers

HORACE DUDLEY PECK of Corona, L. I., a student for the ministry who is preaching among the Navajo Indians, had as a companion missionary Hugh Smith. While Smith was preaching in the "hogans" he contracted black smallpox, of which the Navajos are mortally afraid. Young Peck nursed him in the pesthouse, near which none would go. The doctors and nurses were thirty-five miles away, but Peck did not flinch. His patient recovered, and now his act has opened the way to preaching God's Word to the tribe under most favorable circumstances.

The School of Gentleness

SUNDAY, February 17. Gal. 5:22. "The fruit of the Spirit is . . . gentleness." With what infinite gentleness the Great Physician ministered to bruised reeds and broken hearts! What tender names he gave them! "Son!" "Daughter!" He was never rough, never brusque, never impatient, never in a hurry! His tender approach was part of the cure. His very touch had healing power. He handled the burdens of men in such a way as to immediately make them lighter. Many a broken heart was strangely comforted by his presence even before the life had been made whole. Most surely the hospital work of our Saviour was a school of gentleness!

Have we quite learned his way? "Teach me thy way, O Lord!" Do we know how to lift broken limbs? Do we know how to handle broken lives? Do we find more delight in denouncing sins than in helping sinners? Are we more expert in abstract analysis than in practical comfort? There is surely an almost crushing need of gentleness in days like these. Let us make no mistake about it; we are not less strong when we become gentle. Real gentleness is not weakened strength; it is strength disciplined, purified, refined. Gentleness is matured strength. It is the full corn in the ear. Roughness has never finished its training. It needs to go to school.

And what is the school? It is the school of the Spirit. We need the fellowship of the Holy Ghost. And in that academy school-time is never over. Every new grace unveils another yet to be won. "Glories upon glories hath our God prepared!" One of the treasures of the school is the grace of gentleness. Only we do not so much acquire it, we become it. It is not a work, it is a fruit. It becomes part of our nature as we become partakers of the divine nature in Jesus Christ our Lord. J. H. J.

After the Burial

MONDAY, February 18. Matt. 14:12. "And his disciples came and took up the body, and buried it, and went and told Jesus." Socrates said to his disciples as the shadows of death drew near him, "You may bury me, if you can catch me." Two things the disciples of John the Baptist could not bury—his spirit and his influence. More swiftly than fell the ax, his spirit winged its way to glories past the power of human thought to imagine. The work of John the Baptist lived after him. It was the work of a trench-digger, a foundation-layer. We see the structure, but the substructure is quite as important. John the Baptist's life was a living stone, laid low in the earth, and his blood was the necessary medium to bind that stone to all others subsequently laid upon it, in the building of the earthly foundations of the kingdom of God.

Having buried the body, they went and told Jesus. Weakness flees to strength in hours of peril. We do not hear again of complaint from John's disciples. Jesus hushed it all. He wiped away all tears from their eyes. He led them forth to victory.

The most apparently hopeless hours of earth were those which followed the crucifixion of Christ. But on the morning of the third day the clouds were dispelled and a light shone out from Joseph's garden which grows brighter until the perfect day. When we bury the bodies of our dead, we lift our eyes to heaven and think of the place prepared for them that love God. Our sorrow is not inconsolable, for we too, like the disciples of the Baptist, "go and tell Jesus." C. C. A.

Satan Cast Out

TUESDAY, February 19. John 12:31, 32. "Now is the judgment of the world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." These words were spoken on the eve of the great passion of our Lord. Jesus felt his end approaching. He knew himself to be innocent. Death could, therefore, not have the same meaning in his case as in the case of any other human being. It could not be the wages of his sin, for he knew no sin; he was without sin; he was holy and blameless. When he dies, he says, a judgment will indeed be executed, but it will be the judgment of the world whose sin he bears. The judgment passed on Christ as the world's proxy is, however, to result in the world's salvation. God's sentence upon all wrongdoers is executed, not upon the wrongdoers themselves, but upon another who has taken their place. The world, accordingly, becomes free through the substitutive death of Christ.

This is the magnificent view which Christ takes of his impending death, and which cheers him as he enters the gloomy vale. He is about to achieve a glorious feat, and he is glad that the hour for it has arrived. He also foresees great results in this world of men that shall follow after he has made his sacrificial offering for men: Satan will be cast out. Satan had entered the world in the hour of the first transgression. He had succeeded in making our first parents believe him rather than God. He had been plying his arts ever since, with the same success. All men had come under his influence. Especially through the fear of death which he had brought into the world he reigned over men. He was the world-lord, reigning in the darkness which he had created by continuing and increasing that darkness. Now he shall lose his victory in Eden. He cannot prevent Jesus from accomplishing his Saviour's work. The events on Calvary will spell defeat for him and signal his overthrow in the hearts of men. Men will turn to the cross of Jesus and stake their affections and hopes upon it, and will renounce allegiance to their former master.

George Washington

WEDNESDAY, February 20. Ps. 121:8. "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in." Every great nation begins with a providential hero. Histories are biographies. Noble men form the literature of life. Of the world's greatest characters, George Washington is one of the loftiest on the colossal list. He is called the "Kohinoor diamond in the crown of the Republic," shining with spotless purity.

As God brought Moses out of Egypt into Canaan, so he brought Washington and his countrymen out of tyranny into liberty. Washington won his victories on his knees; his faith in an overruling Providence was complete. He attributed his moral and Christian character, under God's blessing, to the example and precepts of his faithful mother. Among his distinguishing traits was his punctuality and veracity—his truthfulness in word and faithfulness in deed. Faithful in that which was least, he became exalted to that which is greatest. He was silent and thoughtful, rarely ever speaking of himself.

For seven long, weary years, he became a voluntary exile from his beautiful Mount Vernon home. His life and his fortune were willingly laid upon the altar of his country. He lived the hard life of his half-fed soldiers, in self-sacrificing consecration to the principles of liberty. He gave Old Glory to the free air of America, an emblem of fraternity, equality and pure democracy. Abraham Lincoln put more color into its crimson, greater luster into its stars, and brighter blue into its heavens of hope.

Loving the Brotherhood

THURSDAY, February 21. I Peter 2:17. "Love the brotherhood." A rich man invited a poor man to dinner. When they were seated the host said grace, beginning his prayer with the words, "Our Father." After the prayer, the guest inquired, "Is God my Father too?" "Yes, certainly." "You and I are brothers?" "Yes, we are." "Then cut the slices of bread thicker." Socialism? Yes, but not the socialism of Karl Marx; not the socialism of the Russian Bolsheviks, who have such "strong yearnings for the equal division of unequal earnings." Rather the socialism of Moses, of Jesus and of Paul. Moses, Jesus and Paul all admit the righteousness of private ownership, but they all insist upon justice, justice to the strong as well as to the weak, justice to the rich as well as to the poor. They who say everything belongs to everybody, fail to see that, in the end, under this rule, nothing would belong to anybody. Whatever may be the most effective answer to radical socialism, the speediest cure for the person afflicted with it is to acquire a little property of his own.

Take brotherhood at its best, brotherhood in a family in which there are several sons. Each has his peculiar possessions. There is a line of demarcation between what belongs to one and what belongs to another. Private property is not incompatible with brotherhood. However, there are things which are incompatible with brotherhood, and every such thing is doomed to disappear when the kingdom of God has fully come on the earth. Helpless poverty will disappear. Sweatshops and death-reeking tenements will disappear. Child labor will disappear. The liquor traffic will disappear. Class prejudice and race prejudice will disappear. War will disappear. Why this war? Because the human race has not yet learned the divine art of brotherly love, and because back of this war lie hatred, injustice, falsehood and covetousness—the incarnate denial of Christ and his law of love. C. C. A.

The Brother of Men

FRIDAY, February 22. Heb. 2:11. "Both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren." The Sanctifier in this text is Christ, and the sanctified are his believers, the Christians. They are "of one"; that means, they are of the same nature. "As the children are partakers of flesh and blood, Jesus also himself likewise took part of the same."

In his incarnate state Jesus is truly man's Brother. He spoke of men as his brethren when he declared that he would regard any deed of charity done "unto one of the least of these my brethren" as done unto him. He sent the women who came to his sepulcher to the disciples in Jerusalem with this message: "Go tell my brethren."

But why should the apostle emphasize the fact that Jesus is "not ashamed" to call men his brethren? For this reason: Jesus is not a sinner like other men. That is the only difference between him and us, viewed as men. But does not this difference destroy his humanity? Not at all; Adam and Eve were true human beings before the fall; they had been created sinless. So is Christ. In him the original man of paradise has appeared again on earth. He is the second Adam. Moreover, Christ is not only man but God at the same time. He is a man who has been raised to the exercise of the divine majesty. He is exalted to a position of power and dignity which mere man never possessed. This puts him at an immense distance from us. We are groveling in misery; we are contaminated with sin; we are wretched and poor. When Jesus insists on his right to call us brethren, he declares that he does not stand on rank and distinction. He makes nothing of his superiority, except to serve his poor brethren. He relishes the relationship with us miserable beggars. That is great condescension; still more, it is matchless love. W. H. T. D.

The Unsearchable Riches

SATURDAY, February 23. Eph. 3:14. "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith." Paul, in Nero's prison, hobbling about in chains, writes his parishioners of the Ephesian church, where he had served a three years' pastorate, saying, "I long to come to you that I may tell you about the mystery hidden for ages, of the unsearchable riches of Christ: how the Gentiles are made fellow heirs with us."

Was there ever a richer, tenderer, sweeter, more enrapturing prayer than the one Paul uttered in closing this chapter?

He searched all his wonderful vocabulary for words strong enough to express the full meaning of his glorious vision of the Christian's possibility in Christ. Listen to this paradox—"that ye may know the love of Christ that passeth knowledge." That is, know enough to make a fulness for the finite of the infinite ocean; that ye may be able to comprehend the breadth of love divine, as wide as human needs; the length that sweeps through two eternities; the depth that touches the farthest-away sinner; the height that is side by side with the Saviour in glory.

Think of what great requests can be put into language. But more—all we can think. Let imagination fly the earth around. But more—above all we can ask or think, in the limitless beyond. Abundantly above all, beyond the unhorizoned realm of his Father's possessions. Exceeding abundantly above all, according to the power by which he created the world and raised Jesus from the dead. Such is the ability and willingness of the Almighty to satisfy our fondest desire after spiritual good. E. W. C.

SECRETARY OF WAR BAKER answered critics of the Administration's conduct of the war with the declaration that half a million trained American soldiers would be in France early this year, and a million and a half were ready to go during the year. Secretary Baker appeared before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs on January 28, and gave a full report on what America had done in the world war. His statement was a frank and conclusive answer to all criticisms. He admitted there had been delay, but explained that delays had been due to the fact that war conditions were not static and were ever changing.

Here are some of the striking points made by Secretary Baker:

"We will have 500,000 men in France early in 1918 and we will have 1,500,000 ready to ship to France during 1918. At this hour we have a fighting army in France, seasoned and trained to the warfare."

"The German Government is still mystified regarding the number of men now in France."

"We are in the war to hit and to hit hard. Our problem is not one of star playing, but of team playing."

"France and Great Britain are supplying artillery to the American forces, because they themselves wished to do so, as they had an excess on hand and wished to save ships for more vital necessities."

"Ships are the crux of this problem, and every time we can use French industrial resources instead of making and sending our own products, we are doing it."

"The American Army in France, large as it is, and the American Army to be sent there, large as that is, are and will be provided with artillery of the type they want as rapidly as they can use it."

"When we went into the war the standard of the army uniform was 75 per cent. wool and 25 per cent. cotton. But now every yard is of virgin wool, with a large increase in its strength."

"There is no discrimination in the treatment of white and negro troops. . . . Sixty million shells are under manufacture for delivery this year."

"No army ever assembled anywhere was ever fed as ably, as well, as nutritiously and as appetizingly."

"General Wood was recognized by common consent in the army as the most capable to select camp sites and inaugurate a training-camp system."

America Doing Her Part in the War

Over 500,000 Troops in France by Spring and 1,000,000 More Ready Says Secretary Baker

"There are things that could have been better done, but our effort is to learn."

"The German army, best prepared in the world, furnishes an obsolete rifle for practice until men learn to take care of a better weapon."

"We have built in France docks, terminals, sent over dock machinery, cranes, even piles, warehouses at ports of disembarkation for the storage of vast supplies needed before distribution."

"We are taking over and are in process of rebuilding a railroad 600 miles long from our ports of disembarkation to our base of operation."

"We have been building in France facilities, instruments, agencies, just as many as we are here in the United States and more, many of them of the same character."

"We have had to go back to the planting of corn in France in order that we might some time make a harvest. Our operations began in the forests of France, not in the lumber yards, as they did in this country."

"You thought it was better to use the French factories instead of waiting to build our own?" asked Senator Reed.

"Exactly," Secretary Baker replied. "Also it saved tonnage. And I'm telling no secrets when I say that ships are the crux of this problem, and every time we can use French industrial resources instead of making and sending our own products we are doing it."

FOR four hours the Secretary addressed the Committee. In that time he spoke between 35,000 and 40,000 words. He avoided any tendency to pass a personal judgment upon the operations of his department, leaving such conclusions to be drawn by the facts he presented and the opinions offered by experts.

His easy manner, his well-pitched voice, his fluency of speech and his grasp of the subject held the 400 or 500 men and women who heard him in close attention.

The French people had suffered—oh, suffered in a way that not only our language is not adapted to describe but our imagination cannot conceive. The war is in their country. This war has not only been at their doors, but he has been gnawing for two years and a half at their vitals, and when this unsuccessful offensive in France had gone on, there was a spirit not of surrender, but of fate, about the French people, about the mighty military engine which they had seen prepared to overcome them for forty years and was at them, and their attitude was that, no matter whether every Frenchman died in his tracks, as they were willing to do, or not, it was an irresistible thing, and so they said to us, 'Frankly, it will cheer us; it will cheer our people if you send over some of your troops.'

"In so far as I am personally concerned, I know what is ahead of us. I know what the American feeling about this war is. Everybody is impatient to do as much as he can. There will be no division of counsel; there will be all the criticism there ought to be upon shortcomings and failures; there will be, so far as the War Department is concerned, a continuing effort at self-improvement and a hospitality toward every suggestion for improvement that can come from the outside. But the net result is going to be that a united and confident American people, believing in themselves and in their institutions, are going to demand, and that at no late day, on European battlefields, in the face of veterans though they be, that they shall not excel us in achievement; and when the victory is won over there, Mr. Chairman, the credit which will come to American enterprise and to American determination and to American courage will be an honor to us, as the tenacity of purpose and splendid achievements of the British and French already shed great lustre on the names of those great peoples."

Secretary Baker produced a deep impression. This is attested by the expressions of the members of the committee, including several who had opposed the Secretary on previous occasions, and it is further proved by the impression produced upon the President, who was described as being more than satisfied with the Secretary's exposition and certain that it will carry conviction to the country at large.

FOR nearly a week daily reports of casualties had prepared the nation for the announcement on January 31 that American troops, having completed their battle training under French instruction, were actually holding a sector of the front line. On the thirtieth, the enemy raided a sharp salient and listening-post of this sector, killing two American soldiers, wounding four and probably capturing one other, who is reported missing. The attack was made on a foggy morning after a night of patrol work in which there had been no encounters. A barrage of heavy "77" explosive shells and shrapnel was suddenly laid down around the salient, completely cutting off from the rest of our forces and severing its telephone connection. Because of the fog, signal rockets were useless. The small American force fought desperately against superior numbers, and wounded men were certain that the enemy paid a good price for his incursion into our trenches. The Germans carried their killed and wounded back with them. One of the men recently wounded entered the army through the selective draft. The exact location of the American sector is not told, but the enemy lines are very close.

He spoke extemporaneously, referring now and then to statistical data that lay before him on the table. He was rarely interrupted.

"Why did we decide to send some troops to France in 1917? It is no secret," he said. "When Marshal Joffre came to this country from France, when the British mission came from France, they told us of a situation which we had not up to that time fully appreciated. There had been in France recently conducted before that an unsuccessful major offensive.

THE credulous assert that St. Valentine supersedes the postal authorities on the fourteenth of February, and they say that your letter-carrier (elderly, perhaps, and bearded) is Cupid in disguise—Cupid, the rosy-cheeked boy who quite blindly does the bidding of his patron saint. And yet I will always believe that neither St. Valentine nor Cupid had anything to do with the sending of Miss Bentley's valentine. For I saw, quite plainly, behind the crimson cardboard and lace paper and gilt lettering, the hand of God.

Miss Bentley was an invalid. She had always been an invalid since the day, nearly sixty years before, when a little girl's sled collided with a heavy wagon at the foot of an ice-coated hill. And Miss Bentley, during the sixty years of pain and enforced idleness, had not come to look upon life with a sweet resignation. Every twinge of agony had hardened her, every day of the sixty years had made the lines of her mouth more rigid and uncompromising. She lived sullenly in a little cottage with a sullen old colored woman who did her every bidding in silence. And on sunshiny days she pulled the heavy curtains close together, because she liked the darkness better than the light.

One did not blame Miss Bentley for her bitter outlook on life, for the little girl of sixty years ago had been a particularly active little girl. One did not blame her overmuch for her lack of faith in everything. And yet one left her quite alone in her little lonely cottage. There had been a time, long before, when folk had tried to be friendly and had doors slammed in their faces; there had been a time when their gifts of jelly and broth had been returned by the sullen old colored woman, who said, curtly, that "Miz Bentley could afford her own victuals!" There had been a time when a certain pastor had left a certain Testament at the door, and had seen it, the next day, placed conspicuously on the top of a certain ash-barrel. There had been mention of Miss Bentley on the Wednesday following in prayer meeting, and no one had gone near her cottage again, unless some well-meaning newcomer to our town had ventured to call, and had indignantly come away.

The little cottage became something of a landmark. It was pointed out to visitors as "Miss Bentley's cottage," quite as the public library and the town hall were pointed out. But small children, after dark, would cross the street rather than pass it, and mothers, instead of using the familiar by-words, told their disobedient offspring that "Miss Bentley will get you if you don't behave!"

I had lived in town for some years without seeing more of Miss Bentley than a shadowy pinched face that scowled, on rainy days, from behind a dingy cloud of curtains. I had smiled at the face often, and had seen the shade drawn sharply, leaving the window quite blank. I, as a newcomer, had called and been sent away—I had had my fruit and jelly returned. And yet I found myself resenting the town's attitude—resenting the harsh things folk said of her. Often I found myself on the defensive.

"If you," I would say, "couldn't move—if you had to stay a shut-in always—"

It wasn't as if little Ellen Jane didn't know about Miss Bentley. She did! Ellen Jane was Mrs. Simpson's small daughter, and she had been born in the town. She was one of the ones who crossed the street in front of the grim little cottage rather than pass it—she was one of the ones who had known and feared Miss Bentley as a household goblin. It wasn't as if Ellen Jane didn't know. And yet—

I saw Ellen Jane in our stationery store on the thirteenth of February. She is a great friend of mine, and I kissed her little upturned face as she ran to my side.

Miss Bentley's Valentine

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"Now, I wonder," I questioned, "what you're doing—here?" For Ellen Jane was a normal child who usually spent her pennies in the candy shop.

"Why," Ellen Jane answered rather reproachfully, "I'm buying valentines!" And she held out a handful of wonderful creations for me to see. "Which," she questioned, "do you think is the prettiest?"

Quite unhesitatingly I picked out the largest one. It was a chubby red heart, surrounded by lace paper, had one. Everybody else has! An' she can't send it back, because she won't know where it's from. . . . You'll never tell?"

"I promise!" I told her. Ellen Jane looked relieved.

VALENTINE'S Day was bright and beautiful. Excited children haunted each letter box, and even I blushed when the postman handed me a flat pasteboard box. There were roses in the box—red roses. And so I forgot Miss Bentley. Perhaps if I'd been going past her house I might have wondered about her, but I stayed at home that day. I remember that I made cookies which I cut, absently, into hearts; I remember that I set my red roses in a great silver bowl; I remember that I dusted, and that I sang as I worked. And when night came I took a book in my hand and settled down before my grate fire, and waited. For there had been a note with the roses.

I was not surprised when there came a ring at the door bell. It was a quick, impatient ring. I hurried to the door and flung it wide. And then, quite suddenly, I started back in consternation, for an old colored woman had stepped, breathlessly, into the hall.

"P'rhaps," said the old colored woman abruptly, and there was a note of deep feeling under the sullenness of her tone, "p'rhaps you'll come?"

"Come?" I questioned stupidly.

"You was kind," the old woman told me, "mou'n once. We knew. An' now she can't be alone. I think that she's—a goin'!" Her voice broke.

I forgot that I was waiting for some one. I remembered only the face that had looked at me from behind the misty curtains. There was a shawl on the rack by the door, and I threw it over my shoulders. "I'll come," I said.

It wasn't far to the little cottage where Miss Bentley lived. We hurried there silently, the old colored woman and I. There was an unexpected light burning in the window that had always been mysteriously dark, and I stepped back at the doorway to let the old colored woman go in first. You see, I had never crossed the threshold. . . . Perhaps I was nervous. In the tiny hall the old colored woman spoke.

"She's been failin' fer a week," she told me huskily, "but I could do fer her, till now— It's been so long. . . ."

WE entered a little room. It was a cold, almost cell-like little room. There was no note of color in it, and the grim set of black walnut furniture with its marble-topped bureau and table was strangely funereal. It seemed a fit setting for the small, shrunken figure on the bed.

I looked at Miss Bentley, face to face, for the first time. And she looked at me, piercingly, out of keen old eyes. There was silence for a moment, and then, all at once, she drew one hand slowly, painfully, from under the covers. And I saw that it held a bit of crimson paper in the shape of a heart—a heart on a bed of lace paper, with gilt lettering across the surface of it.

"It says," said Miss Bentley, and the voice of her was curiously soft, "it says, 'I love you!'—it says—'I—love—you.'"

The old colored woman was close behind me. "It came this mornin'," she breathed in my ear. "Th' mail man—he brought it!"

Slowly, painfully, Miss Bentley's parchment-like hand drew back under the white covers. It still held the valentine. I groped for something to say.

"It's—it's very pretty," I ventured at last.

Miss Bentley quite evidently did not hear me. Her eyes looked, over my head, to the blank wall beyond.

"Once before," she said, "I got a valentine! Must've been sixty years ago! A little boy sent it"—she choked, and I started forward. But after a minute she went on:

"He had written across it," she said, "'I love you!' . . . I reckon he's gone—now. . . . Ain't never any

VALENTINES

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I PASSED a small shop winder full o' valentines terday.
An' all at once th' world seemed chill an' cold;
It came upon me, sudden, that my hair was awful gray.
An' that my very dreams was growin' old.
An' life stretched out before me like a dreary-colored road.
As unexcitin' as a life could be—
Th' years upon my shoulders seemed as heavy as a load,
A load o' common-sense that wearied me!

I PASSED a little winder full o' valentines terday.
Of lacy ones with scarlet roses twined
'Round chubby little cupids that was smilin' sort o' gay.
An' oh, th' memories they brought ter mind!
Th' memories o' winter when her cheeks was rosy-red,
An' when her eyes was soft with blue delight,
An' when th' only gold I knew was curlin' on her head—
Of winter when th' world was young an' right!

I USTER drag her on my sled—th' roads was white with snow—
Each mornin' ter th' school-house in th' lane;
Because it kept her near me I'd be walkin' sorter slow,
A-feelin'—well, a pleasant kind o' pain!
An' she would talk o' verses on a crimson paper heart.
(Her wistful look would tingle down my spine!)
I still can hear her sayin' as I draw th' years apart,
"I wonder will I get a valentine!"

I PASSED a small shop winder full o' valentines terday:
It made me think o' many years ago;
It made me think o' laughter, an' o' eyes that sparkled gay,
An' sunlight yellin'-bright upon th' snow.
It made me think o' love-time, an' youth's story all untold,
An' o' a boyish heart with dreams astir. . . .
An' fer a moment, maybe, I forgot that I was—old—
An' walked once more, through wonderland, with her!

and across the surface of it—printed brazenly in gold—ran a message.

"I love you!" said the message.
"I like that one," I told her. "Who's it for, Ellen Jane?"

The child moved nearer to me. "You'll promise not to tell?" she questioned seriously. "You'll cross your heart?" and then, as I quite as seriously complied, she put her rosy lips close to my ear.

"I'm going to send it to Miss Bentley," she told me.

I looked at Ellen Jane in blank amazement. "Why, dear," I gasped, "whatever makes you do that?"

Ellen Jane traced circles on the floor with one foot, and followed the movements of her foot with her eyes. At last she spoke.

"I don't think—" she said finally, "that she's ever

THE GREAT CHINESE FLOODS—Floods are almost annual visitations in China. Along the watercourses of the great rivers, north, south and east, they are of frequent occurrence. During the floods of 1899-1901, such a vast territory was inundated and so much damage was done to growing crops over a large area of country, that a great famine was precipitated, the suffering from which continued for several years. In addition to the destruction of property and growing crops, and the loss of life directly due to the inundations, there is almost always an aftermath of disease and suffering. Polluted water, lack of drainage, and starvation are among the causes that produce the epidemics from which China has suffered periodically in the past, and the same causes are likely to produce similar conditions this year. The Union Christian Flood Relief Committee of Pootungfu, whose appeal we published last week in the Christian Herald, has shown the urgency of the need of help.

Pneumonic plague has already appeared in the province, and the government is taking steps to prevent an epidemic.

"HOWARD CHASE"

By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

"HOW can you prove to the community that this story is false?" the deacon asked, coming back to the main point of the matter.

"The night Miss Clark called here with the proof of our Sunday evening dodger, a week ago Friday," said Howard, "I was here in the study alone. My sister brought the proof in here to me, I corrected it, and she took it out there into the sitting-room. Miss Clark did not come in here, and I never saw her."

"So that you two, your sister and yourself, can testify that this story going the rounds is false. That is enough for me. It is impossible for me to believe such a thing of you, but, Mr. Chase, I'm sorry to say there are people in Red Hill, and I fear even some in our own church, who would say you and your sister were—were—"

Howard impulsively jumped up.

"Do you mean to tell me, Deacon Burton, that there are people in this town who would not believe my sister's word?"

Deacon Burton eyed him sorrowfully. "Brother Chase, I am an older man than you are, and I have seen more human nature, as you called it in your sermon last Sunday, than you have. And I have to believe that a community which is evil-minded enough to gossip about everybody as ours is, is also evil-minded enough to judge other people wrongfully. You must remember that Red Hill has not known you very long. You have not established a reputation for anything except—"

"Except—what?" Howard's familiar grin came to his assistance to relieve the deacon at this point.

"Except for a lot of splendid qualities that we all like, for a tongue that preaches a live religion, and a smile that makes dogs love you," said the deacon earnestly.

Howard laughed. And if he had not remembered all the time the sleeping people in the little house, his laugh would have been one of the boisterous kind that sometimes amazed his sister and almost stunned Roy Lennox.

"What more could a fellow ask? And yet"—and instantly his face grew stern—"my reputation in this town is not good enough, nor my sister's, to make people believe us in the face of a silly story that denies all that we stand for. Think of it for a moment, Deacon Burton. Here I come into this little town with my sister, both of us with only one main purpose—to build up this church and preach a real Gospel and make that the great passion of life. And in the face of that, some gossiping man or woman, careless of what it means, is willing, and according to your story even eager, to ruin our reputation and call us liars when we deny, with proof, an impossible story that has been going the rounds. How impossible such a thing could be! What sort of a fool must the people in this little town think I am to throw down at the very start of my career the very structure I came here to build up, and deny all the Christianity I profess—"

HE stopped, struck by the deacon's sorrowful look.

"Well—"

"That is just it," said Deacon Burton with a sadness that Howard remembered long afterward. "A few years ago something like this happened to a young minister in the Presbyterian church in Red Hill. It came out later that he was innocent, but the harm had been done, and it was too late. Individuals have besetting sins, and so do towns. Ours is the sin of judging others and believing evil of them. And I would not be a good friend to you if I did not tell you that in my opinion even if you and your sister deny this story and put your Christian characters in evidence against its cruelty, the town as a whole will believe you are guilty and nothing you can say or do will change its verdict."

It was an astounding statement, made with a seriousness that impressed the deacon's pastor tremendously. He had of late come to know and respect his senior deacon greatly, and had already crossed the formal line that men draw between one another when nothing more is possible than a mild friendliness.

He had been walking around the little room with his swift but noiseless step, mindful of the sleeping inmates in the house, and even while speaking with deep feeling he had restrained the spoken word.

HOWARD sat down, and his look reflected the older man's sadness.

"When you stop to think of it, the whole thing is horrible, isn't it? The people in Red Hill, Kansas, are civilized and most of them would resent it if you told them they were not Christians. And yet they are willing to condemn without any proof an innocent person—Why, it almost makes a man after all these years of Christianity wonder if there is any. Why, it's enough almost to make a man give up his profession of preaching the Gospel and go to raising hogs and alfalfa."

It was the only time in all his life that Deacon Burton ever heard such a note from his pastor, and Howard repented of it as soon as he had spoken. His clean, strong, pure, normal spirit was resilient. It bounded back into its happy free spaces and found expression in the exclamation:

"Don't remember, deacon, what I said just then. I'm going to begin forgetting it right now. In spite of everything you say about the people here I believe there are more good folks than bad in Red Hill, and I'll make the rest believe me. They can't go on believing I'm a fool. In time they will have to—"

"Wait! There is another witness to my sister's testimony and mine. I had forgotten it! Deacon Burton, would the people of Red Hill believe your daughter on oath?"

"Believe my daughter!" Deacon Burton started up in his chair with an energy he rarely exhibited. "Believe Agnes! Why, they would believe her lightest word; she would not have to swear to it. But what has that to do with this matter?"

"Miss Burton was here with my sister that night when Miss Clark called. She knows all about it."

A LOOK of great relief came over the deacon's face.

"That settles it, then. Mr. Chase, the people of Red Hill are as bad as I said they were. But if there is anything I am sure of and proud of it is the confidence every one in this town has in my daughter. Agnes has always been, even as a child, the very image of truth. The pupils in high school have a saying, 'Miss Burton says so.' That is never argued. If Agnes was here that night and testifies for you, the people of Red Hill will never question her statement."

Howard Chase looked at his senior deacon gravely.

"Let us be thankful for that." Then after a moment of silence he said, "There's Miss Clark. What of her?"

"I've been thinking of that," the deacon answered slowly. "Of course she is as much accused as you are. But what can she do?"

"Nothing. I wish she—"

Again that curious pause on his pastor's part which had given the deacon a feeling of uneasiness before, but he waited now for the younger man to make the confidence.

He made it as if he opened a door into a new experience, feeling with every word he spoke the satisfaction of being perfectly understood.

"I haven't any minister, no bishop or father to go to and confess. Perhaps you will be willing—but—the fact that I have discovered that Inez has a feeling for me that—I am sure you will understand it, Deacon Burton, and know how this story complicates the situation—she really has or thinks she has fallen in love. It sounds preposterously egotistic even to say it, but I am afraid it's true, and the feeling I have is one of pity and a desire to save the girl from trouble. I don't believe she would purposely try to do harm, but she is romantic and emotional. A city girl in a country town. You see now the reason for my hesitation at different times when you began your story?"

"Yes. You don't need to explain anything. I'm sorry all this has come to you just as you are beginning here. It seems so unnecessary. I have the utmost confidence in you. I believe when this matter gets cleared up we are going to have a real spell of real religion in Red Hill. We will never have a revival in this town until this evil-mindedness of the tongue is rebuked and stilled. It is our besetting sin, and you are at present the most conspicuous victim; thank God you are innocent and we can prove it."

THEY conferred a little longer, and when Howard finally declared to the deacon his determination on a course of action the older man was at first startled, but after a short argument he said, "Maybe you are right. Do it your own way. Act as the Spirit leads you. The Lord has given you wisdom far beyond your years. In any case we cannot part for the night without a prayer. Let us have that together."

They knelt side by side. Deacon Burton prayed in the same homely, plain fashion that he talked—sincere, simple, trusting, self-effacing. Howard spoke out of a heart that thrilled with conflicting emotions as he thought of the day so near at hand, breaking into strong demand for the people of his own parish, the sheep of his own flock, but at the last including the community in his petition, for the "other sheep," that whether he would or not had become a part of his parish and his problems.

When the men rose they faced each other and tears were on their faces. Deacon Burton's hand went onto Howard's shoulder.

"Pastor, somehow I feel as if the Lord was going to give us a Big Blessing in this little town. We need it. When it comes, I believe somehow you will be in the center of it."

Deacon Burton paused in the doorway on his way out.

"I am wondering why Agnes, knowing everything as she did, has not denied the story before this."

"Perhaps she has not heard it yet," Howard ventured to say.

"Maybe not. People do not go to her with gossip."

Howard said good night and closed the door, and then went back into the study, and sitting at his desk looked up at the Christ in the desert. And as he looked it seemed to him he caught its deeper meaning and was fortified in his purpose to carry out his plan.

SUNDAY morning at the breakfast table Roy Lennox and his wife were talking of the great interest they felt in their first visit to the West. Neither of them before their marriage had been outside of New England. The entire atmosphere of the Western life impressed them strongly. They were enthusiastic over everything they saw and heard.

"Old fellow," said Roy affectionately, "you can't imagine with what interest I am anticipating everything today. I haven't heard any preaching since I left the seminary that I care about. I envy you your parish. Seems to me it must be about ideal. You're just cozily established here, aren't you? Kate and I would give anything if we were as happily settled with a people that loved and trusted us and a real chance to work and preach. He's a very fortunate fellow, isn't he, Miss Chase?"

"Yes. I think so. You are, aren't you, Howard?"

"Yes!" He said it with his characteristic cheerful grin, betraying no hint of what the morning held for him. He emphasized it with a thump on the table. "Yes! I am a fortunate fellow. It's a great place for a preacher. I don't know where the Gospel is more needed than right here in Red Hill, Kansas. It never was more needed than right this minute. I'm glad I came."

Howard excused himself after breakfast and went into his study and shut the door. Rose said it was his regular habit, and Roy and his wife spent the time before eleven o'clock sitting out on the little porch talking about Howard and his ideal little parish and anticipating the service so near at hand.

Only a few feet away from them, in the little study, Howard Chase was going through a mental experience new to him as he dwelt on his plan for the morning.

HE was not depressed by the situation that now confronted him, but he was concerned by it, and all his deep passionate hatred of wrong and littleness smote him and made him hungry to do the right thing. His experiences had not been very many or varied. He was not yet twenty-seven years old, and the problem he now faced was entirely new and he had no precedents to follow.

That hour he spent in the little study was a tremendous hour to his own spirit. As he knelt by his desk, his eyes open toward the picture above it, he seemed to be gazing with his characteristic habit of abstraction at something above it and beyond it. Dreamer and impractical mystic he was not in the ordinary sense, but he was as sensitive to the inner and hidden voices as one of the prophets, and he had that rare quality that a few men possess of absolutely forgetting himself and projecting his problem in front of him as if it were a real object on a screen. And he also possessed the rare gift of a perfect faith in the reality of the spiritual presence, and he would talk in his prayer to the unseen just as if the Person were in the room and might at any moment turn into flesh and blood and become visible.

While Howard was thus preparing his soul for the event of the morning two scenes were being enacted in two other places that were destined to have important bearing on the astonishing outcome of the day.

On reaching home that Saturday night after his interview with his pastor, Deacon Burton had mused in his quiet but not ponderous fashion over the fact of his daughter's knowledge of the minister's innocence and her silence in the face of it. And in the morning he felt so strongly impressed by it that he ventured to speak to her before she went up to the church to rehearse her organ music.

THE deacon's habit was very direct, as illustrated in his interview with Howard. It was the same with members of his own family. And while Mrs. Burton was busy with some part of the housework, and the two were alone. he suddenly said, "Agnes, have you heard this story which has been going around town this last week about Mr. Chase and Inez?"

"Yes, father," she said after a rather long moment.

"And yet you know it is not true."

"I know it is not," she said with quick emphasis, her color deepening.

"And you have said nothing!"

Her answer came even slower than before.

"I have waited—I hardly know why—"

"Mr. Chase told me last night that you were there the Friday night when Inez brought the proof."

"Why has not Mr. Chase himself—"

"Agnes, he actually had not heard the story until I told him. The charges made against him if true would ruin his character and force him to resign. You know the story is cruelly false. How could you keep still?"

"Father," she spoke faintly, "I had been waiting for Mr. Chase himself to speak, to act—to do something." She seemed deeply agitated. "It was all so horrible, it was so widely circulated, I supposed he must have known—I have been very unhappy over it—"

"Daughter," Deacon Burton spoke sternly, "the establishment of his innocence rests with you. Mr. Chase would not appeal to you. Inez's word would carry no weight with Red Hill. You will surely act when the moment arrives to set him right with the people."

"Father!" she said with sudden vehemence. "I will do—I will surely do my part in the matter." She added with a low voice, "It is a cruel wrong! It does not seem possible that human beings can be so wicked."

INEZ'S father, George Clark, the inventor and printer, lived in a world of wheels and pinions and cogs and belts and pulleys and sliding gauges, and sometimes whole days passed without any sense of the world outside his dream of the new machine which was to revolutionize the printing industry.

But coming into his den back of his printing shop late Saturday night he heard voices outside in the alley back of the building.

He had been annoyed at different times by petty thieving, and, suddenly awake to the possibility of discovering the perpetrators, he crossed the room quietly.

Listening there that night at about the hour Deacon Burton and the minister were together in the study, George Clark heard for the first time, from the coarse lips of several Red Hill youths who formed part of a gang that was out late at night, the story that had been going the rounds, by this time exaggerated and multiplied into a story so impossible in its vulgar details that the inventor became at once all father, and his first impulse was to rush out and strike down the ribald jesters gloating over a girl's folly and a minister's downfall.

And then his heart died in him as the question raised at a bound in his mind: Can it have any foundation in fact? Inez—she was a queer girl, romantic, restless, amusement-loving—what if—he had neglected her; she had no mother; she was alone—impressionable—

He fell back from the window and the sweat stood out on his face. He waited until the boys outside moved down the alley, then without turning on a light he groped his way through the shop, let himself out on the street, and started for his home.

He found the house dark. Inez had gone to bed. At first he was tempted to wake her and question her, and confront her with it all as a relief to his own sudden excitement and suspense. But he finally controlled himself, resolved, however, to have it out with her in the morning.

The suddenness of his opening of the subject was in direct contrast with his usual abstracted, dreamy attitude, but Inez did not seem surprised or startled.

HE waited until after breakfast. Then as Inez was getting up to remove the dishes her father, who had watched her moodily during the meal, said harshly: "Inez, I want to talk with you about this story going the rounds about you and Mr. Chase."

Inez sat down. Her face was set with a hardness that did not belong to her soft features.

"There's nothing in it. Mr. Chase never said or did anything."

"How can you prove it?"

"I don't have to. Miss Burton was there that night. She knows I never went into his study."

"Miss Burton!" George Clark gasped, and his eyes gleamed. "But why have you not come to me! Why have you not said something?"

"Father, have you lived in Red Hill all these years not to know that when the reputation of some one was at stake a denial was always taken as a confession of guilt?" She said it scornfully.

"Why does not Miss Burton deny it?"

"I don't know. Perhaps she hasn't heard."

"Why doesn't Chase say or do something?"

"I don't know." Inez spoke wearily. "Perhaps he hasn't heard."

Her father got up so hastily that his chair fell over. He came around the table and took Inez into his arms. He had not held her so since she was a little child.

Inez lay for a moment there as still and unresponsive as a dead person. Then suddenly she flung her arms about her father's neck, and began to cry.

"Oh, father! send me away! I can't bear to stay here any more!"

"Send you away! Where!"

"I don't know," said Inez. Her cry stopped almost as soon as it began. She seemed on the point of confidence, then suppressed it. And slipping out of her father's arms, she began to take the dishes from the table.

George Clark eyed her doubtfully.

"Mr. Chase, Miss Burton, somebody must refute this story. They must clear you of blame."

"They will in time, I am sure."

"They'll have to or they will hear from me." Clark, like many introspective and visionary people, when roused was vehement and loud.

Inez went on with her work. When she was through with it she went upstairs, and came down about half past ten, dressed for church.

"You are not going to church, Inez?"

"Why not?" She spoke defiantly.

"I am going over to rehearsal."

"You are a queer girl, Inez."

She stopped as she was going out.

"Maybe I am, father. But I am not half so queer as I might be—if—"

SHE went out without having given him the full confidence he might have earned if he had built up through her girlhood a real fatherhood, and he sat there troubled and dissatisfied over the whole thing except the knowledge of her innocence, and when it was time to go over to church he went somehow anticipating a scene.

Scores of people were passing through the streets going to the Congregational church. The chorus rehearsal was interrupted by the early comers. Sunday school in Red Hill was still held in the afternoon. Eleven o'clock was known as church hour, and long before the little clock on the wall opposite the organ pointed the time, the building was crowded, the annex had overflowed, seats had been brought in again from the parsonage and the next house, groups of men and boys stood outside the open windows, and bunches of men who could not get in even to the little vestibule could be seen together engaged in conversation carried on in a low tone, but evidently centering around the new minister and the latest scandal.

Roy Lennox and his bride, seated with Rose, were intensely interested in the event.

There was an air of expectancy over the room.

Agnes Burton at the organ betrayed no unusual feeling, but her inward feeling was tumult. Inez, in the chorus, sat looking straight forward, her hands clasped over her hymn-book.

And over the whole of that strange service as it went on up to the time when Howard rose to preach, a powerful Presence brooded unseen and unnoted by any of the hearts that beat fast, unseen and unnoted by all except the minister himself as he rose to give his prophet message to his people.

"More Corns Than Ever But They Do Not Stay" The Story That Millions Tell

THIS is not a way to prevent corns. That would mean no dainty slippers, no close-fitting shoes. And that would be worse than corns.

Our plea is to end corns as soon as they appear. Do it in a gentle, scientific way. Do it easily, quickly, completely, by applying a Blue-jay plaster.

Modern footwear creates more corns than ever. But have you noted how few people ever evidence a corn?

The chief reason lies in Blue-jay. It is ending millions of corns each month. Instantly, for every user, it puts a quietus on corns.

The procedure is this: Attach a Blue-jay at the first sign of a corn. It will never pain again. Let it remain two days, and the corn will disappear. Occasionally, an old, tough corn needs a second application. But that's an easy matter, and the corn is sure to go.

This is the modern method. Old, harsh, mussy methods are long out-of-date. Paring, of course, is dangerous.

Here a gently-acting wax is centered on the corn alone. The corn is protected in the meantime, and the wrapping fits like a glove.

It's the expert way of dealing with a corn, and everyone should employ it.

Try it tonight. Note the results on a single corn. In a few hours you will know that corns are needless. Never again will you pare or pad them, or treat them in old-time ways. And never again will you let a corn spoil an hour of joy.

How Blue-jay Acts

"A" is a thin, soft pad which stops the pain by relieving the pressure.
"B" is the B&B wax which gently undermines the corn. Usually it takes only 48 hours to end the corn completely.
"C" is rubber adhesive which sticks without wetting. It wraps around the toe, to make the plaster snug and comfortable.
Blue-jay is applied in a jiffy. After that, one doesn't feel the corn. The action is gentle, and applied to the corn alone. So the corn disappears without soreness.

Following the Men to Camp

FEBRUARY 18 to 25 has been set aside by the National Lutheran Commission for Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare as the week in which to bring home to every Lutheran in America the call for spiritual service for the Lutheran men in the Army and Navy. It is a week of sacrifice in which every Lutheran will be asked to contribute toward raising the budget for the first year's work, $750,000.

When the first Lutheran men left the home congregations for camp the various Lutheran bodies appointed boards, each feeling that it might take care of its own men independent of the others. It took only a very short time to convince most of the need of concerted action. As a result the National Lutheran Commission for Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare was appointed as the body through which the wartime service of the Lutheran Church might be coordinated and made effective. All synods are represented in the Commission except the Synodical Conference. The Commission today is the representative Lutheran body, and its work has met with the heartiest commendation and appreciation as one of the most effective agencies to bring Christ to the camp and to the front.

The Secretary of the Navy has commended the work of the Commission in highest terms. In a letter to Dr. F. H. Knobel, the chairman, he writes: "I take pleasure in expressing my hearty endorsement and approval of the purpose of the Lutheran Church of America, through the National Lutheran Commission for Soldiers' and Sailors' welfare, to minister to the moral and spiritual needs of the Lutheran men in the service. I am confident that the campaign of the Lutheran Church to raise the necessary funds for this work will meet with prompt and gratifying success. It is gratifying that the Lutheran Church has recognized so fully its duty to the Lutheran men in the service." Gov. W. L. Harding of Iowa writes in similar strain: "The wonderful service you are rendering in ministering to the spiritual needs of Lutheran men in the military establishment of this nation has come to my attention, and I take this occasion to say that your work is one of the splendid things growing out of the war."

THE National Lutheran Commission got down to business quicker than any commission or committee in the history of Lutheranism in America that faced a task of similar magnitude and complexity. Two field secretaries, Rev.

H. R. Gold for the Eastern District, and Rev. H. Stub for the Western District, immediately visited every camp to study the needs right on the ground. In the headquarters, 437 Fifth Avenue, New York City, Rev. William Freas as office secretary canvassed the home congregations for the names of the men with the colors. As a result twenty-four pastors have been stationed at camp, thirty-four chaplains, upon recommendation to the government, have been appointed to chaplaincies. A great number of pastors near camps, training stations and hospitals have been enlisted to aid. At Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Iowa, the Lutheran Brotherhood has erected a building at a cost of $20,000 for the use of the 9000 Lutherans encamped there.

THERE are today approximately 165,000 Lutheran men with the colors. That figure is arrived at by striking an average from congregations that have reported. It tallies with the figures reached by estimating on the basis of the membership of the Lutheran Church, the total population of draft age, and the number of men in the army. If all baptized Lutherans are counted there may be close to 300,000 with the colors. One young man of Lutheran parents was prepared for baptism in a Southwestern camp. He was moved to the North, to the Southeast, to Camp Upton on Long Island, and to France. At each camp he was followed by the National Lutheran Commission and reached by the camp pastor, but left before he could be baptized. He will be reached in France.

The National Lutheran Commission has completed its first task: to follow the men into camp with the message of Christ. Now it is turning to its second task: to bring the message of its service to the home congregations and drive home the need of sacrifice. It is aiming for $750,000 to cover its first year's budget. It proposes to gain that fund through a personal canvass of every Lutheran in America. Sixty thousand men and women have been organized into a vast army to visit every Lutheran in the week of February 18 to 25, to set before him the great emergency call which has come to Christian men and women. The whole campaign is in charge of the chairman of the Finance Committee of the National Lutheran Commission, Mr. E. F. Ellert. A state chairman in each state is responsible to the National Lutheran Commission for the thorough organization of the community. O. H. PANCKOKE.

The Soldiers in the Cities

THE Playground and Recreation Association of America was requested by the War Department to send a trained worker to the camps to organize the social resources of these communities.

The city of Indianapolis is providing wholesome recreation for the men at Fort Benjamin Harrison. James Edward Rogers organized a committee of citizens appointed by the mayor. The swimming pools of the Y.M.C.A. have been passed over to the soldiers. Lodges are getting in touch with their members. Athletic meets have been arranged. The Y. W. C. A. has raised $1,200 for rest-rooms for women guests of the soldiers.

Chattanooga, Tenn., is acting as host to the men at Fort Chickamauga and Fort Oglethorpe. Guides are to take the soldiers on trips to places of historic interest. All public recreation facilities have been placed at the disposal of the soldiers. The free use of a twenty-five acre swimming pool has been offered the men. A "dry saloon" is one of Chattanooga's most valuable contributions to the comfort of her guests. For the rental and maintenance of this the city appropriated $2,000. The entertainment of the soldiers in the homes is one of the most delightful outgrowths of the work of the committee.

Twelve miles from Niagara Falls Fort Niagara is located. The Committee on Training Camp Activities, organized by Ira W. Jayne, is striving to meet the needs. Private individuals are opening their homes to the student officers.

Little Rock, Ark., and Argenta are uniting to care for the soldiers at Fort Logan H. Roots. The work is now being carried on by Myron A. Kesner. The city has granted the use of the municipal auditorium for concerts and entertainments. The entertainment of soldiers at Sunday dinners is one of the splendid features of Little Rock's hospitality.

San Antonio has organized its work for the soldiers, Elbert M. Vail acting as executive secretary. The Park Department is providing lights, benches, and a band for moving picture band concerts on the Plaza in front of the Alamo. Under the auspices of the Y. W. C. A. social gatherings are being held. A number of saloon-keepers are transforming their saloons into eating-places, where soft drinks will be served.

The cities of Norfolk, Washington, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Plattsburg, Sacketts Harbor, Watertown, Junction City, Newport, San Francisco, Syracuse, El Paso, Atlanta, Chicago, Gettysburg, Salt Lake City, Petersburg, Ayer, Mass., and Sparta, Wis., are taking a census of the men in camp, and coordinating all forces which will register for good. Other cities will be added to the list as the sites for the camps are decided on.

Adventures in Neighboring

A Department for the Exchange of Experiences Between All Who Have High Community Ideals and Are Putting Them into Practice

Conducted by VERA L. CONNOLLY

TODAY'S meeting, fellow adventurers, is such an important one, and is to be so crammed full of good things, that it is hard to know just where to begin!

First of all, perhaps, it would be graceful of us to thank the writer of this gift-poem, "Fellowship"; just as, in a regular club meeting, we would thank the soloist for her contribution. For this beautiful bit of verse was written for us.

I like especially what the writer has to say about "understanding." She calls it "diviner" than sympathy. And isn't she right! Can't we all recall bitter hours, or years, which were made easier for us by some friend saying: "I know what you are going through; for I've stood just where you stand"? How different that is from: "I'm sorry for you"!

No one, in a dark hour, wants to be pitied. Pity is intolerable to the sore of heart. But understanding—ah, that is another thing! For that is born of brotherly love.

And brotherly love, it seems to me, is the basis of all true neighboring. So, dear fellow adventurers, let us keep this always in mind when we go a-neighboring—this "love-first" rule of life. Let us be sure, before we set out, that there is only kindness in our hearts. Then, no matter what we do, how we blunder, good will come of it.

SOMETIMES I wonder if there is a person in the world who is not lonely, now and then. Of course, there may be. But this I know: there are hundreds, thousands of fine men and women in this world who are slowly starving for affection, for a word of comradeship, for some one to take an interest.

I hear from these lonely folk constantly, through my mail. Appeal after appeal, from lonely hearts, comes in to me. I cannot pay for these messages, as they are not "adventures in neighboring." I cannot even give up the main part of our page to them. But this I am going to do—throw open a little corner as a sort of "Neighbors' Forum," to be devoted to appeals, questions, hints, advice, news from communities which have been helped by us: in short, all the fine, human things your letters contain apart from actual "adventures in neighboring." I cannot pay for what appears in this little corner. It must all be given voluntarily. For this corner is to be the test of our brotherly love—our true neighborliness. I have no fears, dear adventurers, as to what your response will be. I know that it will be great and generous and very helpful.

Before leaving this subject, I should like to thank all those who have so generously sent to Mrs. N. H. W. (in my care) plans and suggestions for the awakening of that community and the winning of those boys. I am sending the letters to her, so that she may read them and set joyfully to work.

BEFORE plunging into today's "adventures in neighboring," there are two matters to touch on: first, the admitting of the men folks to our department, and secondly, the founding of our club. The first question we can consider settled. For from all over the land your hearty "Include the men by all means! We need them!" has reached my desk. And so, women neighbors, let us invite our husbands, sons, brothers, friends, neighbors, town officials, county agents, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, ministers, teachers, business associates—all the manly, thoughtful, high-minded men living about us—to contribute to this department out of their wide experience along lines of community service.

We shall need their help, too, when we undertake the founding of our club. For that we are going to have a club, of some sort, becomes more apparent to me every day! I was not sure that all of us would want one. But your letters—afire with enthusiasm—banish my doubts. And what letters they are! What splendid letters! I can hardly resist the temptation to begin publishing some of them now. But that would not be fair, as the contest does not close until March 15.

Eventually the right plan will appear. Of that I am certain. Perhaps it is among those I have already received. It is impossible to tell until every Christian Herald neighbor has been heard from. Some of you are doing this now. Surely no club founded with such unselfish enthusiasm as this could possibly go wrong!

NOW, dear comrades, with the business of today's meeting off hand, we can throw "long, long thoughts" to the four winds and gaily go a-neighboring.

An Old-Fashioned Singing School

After reading others' adventures in neighboring, I thought I would like to tell you what a number of farmer folks in our neighborhood did some winters ago. About ten families of

FELLOWSHIP

By JESSAMINE G. CHILDS

I ASK not to be understood;
I only ask to understand;
In any clime, in any land,
To grasp each friend or fellow by the hand,
And look into his eyes and say,
"I understand."

I understand because I know
The heartaches and the joys of living too;
I may have stood myself just where you stand
Can I transform you with diviner wand than sympathy,
And tell you of some peace I may have found,
Not asking to be understood,
Only to understand?

us started a real old-fashioned "singing school." Clubbing together, we secured (for singing lessons) the services of the church choir-master—a grand old man with snow-white hair and a voice as sweet and clear as a boy's.

Every Friday evening we met in the school-house, which was in the center of the community; and once a month we gathered at the home of one of the ten families of us, enjoying what was called a "singing bee." At these monthly meetings a musical program was carried out, and sometimes there were readings and recitations. After the close of the program the hostess served refreshments of some sort—cake and coffee, popcorn, apples, candy, nuts; whatever was the least trouble.

Always, at the close of our "school" term, we gave a concert and social at the school-house, when every member must do his or her part to help carry out the carefully prepared program. There was a lunch afterward, which all had helped provide.

Looking over the different social affairs of many rural winters, this venture seems to have been the best. I hope some other community will try it and get as much pleasure from it as we did. Mrs. F. E. T.

What fun that singing school must have been! We can't all sing; but we can all make cheerful sounds that are drowned in the general commotion, and which give us lots of pleasure. I speak feelingly, for I cannot sing at all; and yet I don't believe there is anything I enjoy quite so much as having a try at it in company with a lot of friends who can really sing. Do start this "old-fashioned singing school," dear neighbors, and let Mrs. F. E. T. hear about your experiment through the "Neighbors' Forum."

OUR next "adventure" is of a different sort, and should be of interest to every one—man or woman—living in a farm community. A mighty earnest, worth-while account this is; and yet this brave woman did no more for her community than lies within the power of many of us, either directly or through some one better able to present the facts than we.

Procuring Aid from the State Legislature
My greatest "adventure" in neighboring came to me through the fact that I was County Superintendent in a pioneer country for several years. In visiting the schools, I stayed at the homes of the people overnight, and heard all their troubles in regard to roads, unequal taxes, no cars for crops, the fact that thousands of bushels of potatoes were dumped in the river every year because they had no sale for them, etc., etc.

I found many of the people planning to leave the country because they did not have the sale for their products that they should have had. This, with the fact that the schools could not be maintained properly on account of lack of taxes and poor roads, led me to tell my story to a friend. This friend assured me that I could get aid through the state legislature if I would go after it. I shrank from this, being the daughter of a conservative New England woman and being of a very retiring nature. It seemed to me I simply could not go to the legislature!

My friend, hearing this, did the very kindest thing a friend could do. He told me sincerely that if I felt that way about it, I certainly ought to be willing to resign my position and let some one else take up the matter. For a week I had a struggle with my conscience. Then I summoned the courage to make my appeal—to the state's attorney and to the legislature, who sent a committee to that region to investigate my story. Here they were met by 300 men, only five of whom were able to get to town with a team in the summer-time.

The result of this was a year of hard fight, well supported by the newspapers and by many kind people in legislative circles. The effort was crowned by an appropriation of $50,000 and a constitutional amendment. This amendment, four years later, became a part of the constitution; and now the state builds roads in and around its own lands. As the state pays no taxes, this means much to the settler, who is now able to get his goods to market and earn enough to support his family. Miss A. E. S.

THIS brings us to the last few moments of our meeting today; and to our new little corner in neighboring—our "Neighbors' Forum."

Neighbors' Forum

I wish I could talk with Mrs. N. H. W. Couldn't she invite those neighbors of hers to her home at an appointed time to work for the soldiers or the Red Cross?

Miss H. A. H.

Our "adventures in neighboring" have just put an idea into my head, which may prove worth while for me and some other lonely woman. First let me say that I am all alone in the world, and therefore know how much good even a post-card can do one sometimes. The man I was to marry died when we were nearly ready; next father (a minister) dropped dead; and five years later mother "went home." Better off than many because I have a home and my work, also many friends, yet I do so enjoy my mail! When I come home and into the house alone, to eat alone, if I see something through the glass in my mail box, I can hardly wait until I get my door open, take my post key from its hook, and get my mail. Then I go in to read it, and it breaks up that horrid, lonesome entrance. Now, I wonder if there might not be some lonesome city girl, or woman on a ranch, who can afford the mail expenses, and who would enjoy writing to me. I do not wish any one to do it just to help me; I hoped some one who rather enjoyed letter-writing might get as much fun out of it as I! As I am an old teacher, and have traveled quite a bit, it should be pleasant for both.

Miss J. T. B.

Do you realize the tendency there is in many communities to make sport of those not so bright as the majority? And that there are many timid children and young people who fear to take part in community affairs, lest they be laughed at? These should be especially cared for and made to feel that their services are needed. W. A. S.

I suggest that Mrs. N. H. W. appoint a day of meeting for a Sunday school, and conduct and superintend it herself until she is no longer needed. She will make a success of it. Mrs. E. J. W.

AND now the clock has struck, dear neighbors, and we must part for another fortnight. That is, it will be two weeks before we meet again. But this does not mean that all neighboring between us need cease. For our letters—like carrier pigeons bearing cheery greetings and messages—will be winging their way from neighbor to neighbor.

Success with Flowers

Are your plants, vines, and shrubbery doing well? Have you had success with your flowers or do they look sickly and thriftless? Do you realize that "scraggly" plants are worse than no plants at all? The difference between weak, thriftless, off-colored plants, and healthy, luxuriant, rich colored flowers and foliage, is the difference between success and failure. If your plants are not doing well, chances are they need food. They are being starved and are an eyesore and a source of annoyance rather than pleasure, but don't throw them away, use

These Plants Thrive With Red Snapper Plant Food

Red Snapper Plant Food

RED SNAPPER PLANT FOOD is a wonderfully rich, yet harmless fertilizer for plants of this kind. Its effect can be noticed within a few days after the first application. Color of foliage becomes darker green and flowers and blossoms take on a beauty of coloring and size beyond all expectations—the wonder and admiration of all who see them. It is made from the head bones and nitrogenous cartilage of the South American Red Snapper fish, dried under intense heat, mixed with other organic plant foods to make a perfectly balanced ration, then ground and boiled in flour mill machinery into a fine meal. It is thoroughly sterilized, clean and sanitary, to be used in the finest homes and conservatories as well as for outside use. Put up in 2 lb. cans including an 8 oz. package of RED SNAPPER Plant Tonic which is used to give the plants quicker start. Price 50c. Also put up in 12 1/2 lb. burlap paper lined sacks. Price $1.50. For sale by all leading Florists, Druggists, Grocers and Nurseries. Ask your dealers. If they have not got it, send us their names and we will see that they get it for you. For your trouble we will send postage prepaid, our valuable booklet, "HOUSE PLANTS AND FLOWER GARDENS—Their Care and Culture," which contains fourteen chapters of general information. This is worth 50c alone to any lover of flowers. Dealers who are not already handling this product should send for our Introductory Sales Proposition.

Jesus Teaching by Parables

II. The Growth of the Kingdom. International Sunday School Lesson for February 24. Mark 4:21-34.

By REV. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

THE little parables we are now studying are all the outgrowth of the great key-parable of the Sower and the Soils. So our lesson is really a series of reflections on the principles of Kingdom-building. He was guarding them against error and discouragement and urging them on to thoughtful and patient witnessing for him.

Jesus finds the metaphor of the seed and soil inadequate here, so he supplements it. The seed ought to grow, the light ought to shine. Give it a chance to shine; don't hide it away under the baskets of trade or under the coverlets of comfort. You must be active and eager and thoughtful. Consider carefully what you hear and let the truth bear its fruit in righteous deeds. If you are willing to hear and to heed, you shall have the privilege of hearing more. In the Kingdom, to him that hath shall be given. You get what you show capacity for. A ready and well-stored heart will receive yet more and more, but a petty and trivial spirit will grow less and less. So "expect great things from God and attempt great things for God." Be not small-minded toward truth. Let your soul be enlarged until you are filled with all the fullness of God.

The Sure Growth of God's Kingdom

The good seed must be sown, but aside from that we are not to exhibit too much anxiety concerning the harvest. Even the wisest and most thorough husbandman, after he has prepared the ground and sown the choice wheat broadcast, must needs leave much to God and nature. He doesn't have to tend his crop night and day as though he alone were at work thereon. Let us cultivate and improve the ground of Christian hearts; let us by all means sow the seed on all soils; but let us also trust mightily in the Lord of the harvest, who makes it to grow in unseen depths and sends without our help refreshing showers. We must not fret and worry as those who would hasten the yellowing of the cornfields. Only remember there are harvest seasons here and now, times for ingatherings, times to conserve the fruits of the Spirit, seasons when we must once more do our part that the good gifts of God may be distributed to the waiting and needy world.

The Harmony of Seed and Ground

"The earth beareth fruit of herself," said Jesus. There is a preestablished harmony between seed and soil. The ground not only receives but gives. And in the same way God's Word and man's heart are mutually complementary. The task of the Church of God is not the impossible one of forcing the will of God on a hard and resisting alien element, like grain on granite, but of implanting the Father's grace in the child's spirit, like seed in soil, sometimes poorer or richer, but inherently adaptable to the purpose. The human soul was created for this very thing, that it should receive and reproduce the thoughts of the Almighty.

Here, again, is ground for confidence in the victory of the Kingdom, despite all hindrances. Man awaits the Gospel as the neglected prairies long awaited the golden grain. The duty of the evangel is to bring the seed to every land, far and near. In so far as that is done, we need not doubt and fear while Hindu and Chinese and Japanese are slowly maturing their contributions to the Kingdom. We must await without dread the outcome, remembering how Hebrew and Greek and Barbarian received the Word and brought forth much fruit in those days of long ago.

The Power of Little Things

Pausing in his teaching, Jesus deliberately challenged thought and surprised his friends into a realization of the power of little things. "How shall we liken the Kingdom of God?" he asked. Picture them pondering a worthy answer. Then Jesus calmly says, "As unto a grain of mustard seed!"

Wrapped up in that little grain you hold is something that all earth's wisdom could not duplicate. I like to think that Jesus reached forth and plucked such a seed and held it there; fit symbol of the insignificant beginning of world changes which his followers should yet effect, because "in him was life."

Charles Mackay has a poem beautifully setting forth the universal truth Jesus was picturing here. In part he sings—

A traveler on a dusty road
Strewed acorns on the lea;
And one took root and sprouted up
And grew into a tree. . . .

A little spring had lost its way
Amid the grass and fern;
A passing stranger scooped a well
Where weary men might turn. . . .

A nameless man, amid the crowd
That thronged the daily mart,
Let fall a word of hope and love,
Unstudied, from the heart.
A whisper on the tumult thrown,
A transitory breath,
It raised a brother from the dust,
It saved a soul from death.

O germ! O fount! O word of love!
O thought at random cast!
Ye were but little at the first,
But mighty at the last.

This is the lesson here for our younger classes—indeed, for us all. Christ would have us estimate things by their spiritual potencies. He would have us remember the supreme importance of little things. And these are the things that we can do, but every day neglect.

The Gradual Progress of the Kingdom

The parables of the Kingdom prepare us for small beginnings and assure us of mighty consequences. They also remind us at every turn of gradual and even slow progress in transforming humanity, until earth shall be a heaven. But the progress is sure, with the certainty of nature's harvests, "first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear." "It is God that giveth the increase," as another successful sower reminded the turbulent Corinthians.

Our God is marching on. Not even this frightful world-war of man's doing can check the steady march of his holy purposes. He will not fail. So his children must not despair.

"Thy kingdom come, soon, soon," we cry. "Thy will be done, now, now, on earth as in heaven." We are so impatient, as though we had done so very much in vain. How patient God is, as with infinite grace he strives to lead men onward and upward till they are fit and ready to know him as he is, and to serve with perfect love!

It is a suggestive touch that Jesus lends when he pictures his seed become a veritable tree, sheltering under its branches the birds of the heaven. It leads us to consider how already earth's homeless and needy have been shielded and blessed by the spread of the Kingdom. It reminds us of the by-products of Christianity, its institutions of charity and mercy, its agencies of education and beauty, all the many branches of the Church whose leaves are for the healing of the nations. Slaves have been set free, children rescued from poverty and ignorance, woman placed by man's side as his equal, savages taught decency and morality. The glories of Christian art and the harmonies of Christian music and the greatness of Christian literature all go back to that seed-sowing in Galilee by the humble, patient Master. His words were spirit, and they were life. Already men are enjoying that life which he came that they might have abundantly.

PASSED BY THE BOARD OF CENSORS

Do you remember seeing those words flashed on the screen when you were at the movies?

Moving pictures are censored so that you may see only plays that are helpful, sane, and clean—so that you will not be "taken in" and pay good money for a worthless or baneful show.

The advertising pages of CHRISTIAN HERALD are like the movies—censored for your benefit and protection.

A board of censors passes on each advertisement before it can appear.

Thousands of dollars have been saved to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers by this precaution of permitting only honest advertising of reputable concerns to be shown on the CHRISTIAN HERALD "screen."

No wonder CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are a responsive audience. They know their money always gets a good show when it's spent for anything advertised here.

The Church After the War

Further Outspoken Views on the Great Religious Problem of the Hour

IT IS evident that the interchange of views among the leading pastors and laymen of different denominations relative to the Church's preparation for the great opportunity that will be open after the war is destined to spread far. The discussion is now being taken up by the press very widely, the religious weeklies especially, and is being chosen as a theme in many pulpits throughout the country. The Christian Herald is satisfied to have been the means of stimulating public interest in the great question, which was first discussed in the Religious Congress at Pittsburg.

In an address before the Boston Baptist Ministers' Association lately, Rev. Frederick B. Greul, D. D., fairly described the revival of the spirit of Christianity which is making itself felt in the Church today. Among other things he said:

"All hysterical attempts to push back the ocean-tide of liberated thought with ecclesiastical uproar and the withering nastiness of sectarianism will come to a sad end. God is in his world. Christ is getting a new hold on the hearts of men. It may be the present ghastly exhibition of collective murder in Europe will put the Church on edge, bring her to her senses, and start her back to her God again.

"No single denomination is any less such a denomination because it works under a common Commander, and side by side with other denominations, saved by the same Saviour, in the same way. To the extent that the Church Universal has made the upbuilding of herself in denominational segments the chief end of her life, she has diverted her energies from the straight and narrow way, and needs to be called back by her Lord. To the extent she has gone into world-saving with no end in view but to glorify God and save men, regardless of her own gains in men and money, she has a right to the respect of men, and the approval of God.

"Now the Church is being born again, and, coincidental with missionary history, she has shown new life, and a decided and ever-widening interest in her legitimate business as the representative of God among men.

"There are present with us certain things that are excitingly interesting as indications of the return of the Church Universal to the truth as viewed in the large sense that I have endeavored to state. I will mention a few of the more conspicuous ones. The uprising of the Christian laymen, and their advocacy that emphasis shall be placed on vital fellowship henceforth, rather than on dogmatic or ecclesiastical technicalities, has taken such a grip on the people that it cannot be shaken off. The ever-widening conviction that it is wrong and wasteful to support sects, simply as sects, and for sectarian ends, is puncturing some of the ecclesiastical idols worshiped, in the main, by the clergy. The internal war of brotherhood with brotherhood has been and is a scandal and a stench, that will not be tolerated as it used to be. The resistless push for a simple formula of faith is with us, as an indication of how the people are feeling. The popular demand for retirement of the perfunctory preacher, and the substitution of the leadership of men with a prophetic spirit, is being heard and may well occasion alarm among the stereotyped minds in the ministry.

"If such things really exist it is useless to enumerate others equally important and insistent upon a hearing. These indications have evolved from spiritual hunger. They betoken Christian forces likely to break out for larger things than they have been getting. They promise bigger visions of the nature of the Kingdom of God and its wonderful mission.

"The Church Universal has broken with many clannish traditions, and will never again be chained down to them. For this we may thank God! Vital truth is displacing abstract dogmatic statements. Life is dominating dogma as the chief thing. . . . The religious forces of the world are moving toward a more unselfish and evangelical service, and are writing it large all over the world, which indicates the return of the Church to power."

The Church Must Find a New Bond of Brotherhood, Writes Rev. Percy S. Grant

THE Christian Church has multitudes of kindly ministers and well-disposed people. It has also a tradition of leadership. Otherwise it is behind rather than in the van of ideas and social construction.

The workingmen have had more to say about the war than has the Church. They are interested in the human problem of betterment. The Church seems anxious only about its own preservation. Its creeds, as well as its social conservatism, stand in the way of its leadership. It is largely behind the intelligence of the world.

The Church, too, is the source of large economic waste. Some churches have medieval notions of charity and perpetual ignorance and incapacity. Others, by denominationalism, wholly miss the social trend for spiritual advancement.

We should cut out creeds; adopt the modern psychology; accept modern economic ideas and consolidate church property; reduce number of clergy; find in human requirements for health and happiness and opportunity a new bond of brotherhood.

When the Church Becomes Entangled with the World Her Spiritual Influence Wanes, Writes a Canadian Churchman

YOU have asked for an expression of views on the work of the Church and its influence on the world. You have two lines of teaching. Dr. Gray is showing from the Scriptures the accumulation of evil, till headed up in a universal rebellion against God, presided over by the man of sin, to be destroyed at the appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ, who will visibly rule through his saints. This view does not overlook the fact that immense progress may be made in material things, and almost an era of peace, that will deceive many; but it will be brought about by man's efforts and God will be displaced. All can join in this wonderful progression, the professing Church and the Jew, the Papacy, the Moslem, the Greek Church and the Socialist. It will appeal to all, for dogma and creed can be held or not as one pleases. The other view, which is set forth in your pages, is that the Christian Church is to be the prime agent in the uplift of mankind, and in this crisis which has fallen on the world she has lamentably failed. If this be the purpose for which the Church was called out (ekklesia), she certainly has failed, and emphasized her failure.

Now, if the Church (a spiritual body) had kept herself separate from the world, her influence would be tremendous. We have no better object lesson than the early Christians. While they were under the ban of the heathen Roman empire, they so influenced it that it became nominally Christian; but when the Church allied itself with the world, its influence was lost and merged into the dark ages.

I am thankful for the many movements for the suppression of the evils we are surrounded with; but let the Christians be careful that they move not away from the high calling God has called them to, and find themselves entangled in purely secular objects and have to lament with the bride: "They made me keeper of the vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept."

CONCRETE ROADS

When the Call Came for More Ships

The CONCRETE ROADS of Snohomish County, Wash., were ready for immediate hauling, by motor truck, of millions of feet of timber for ships and airplanes.

Motor trucks carry the ponderous logs over the 106 miles of concrete roads in Snohomish County at steady speed, 365 days a year, without interruption, more quickly and more dependably than any other means or avenues of transport.

This is but one instance of road preparedness supporting and expediting war preparedness. If concrete road systems were available everywhere, the Nation's vast war production as well as its commerce would be unhampered by shortages of fuel and raw materials. Its full military and industrial power could be mobilized.

Concrete highways are as necessary in peace as in war. They are becoming the very arteries of national life. Systems of them should be built. Delay only adds to the enormous burden which the public bears in maintaining impermanent highways under heavy motor traffic.

SONG STORIES OF THE SAWDUST TRAIL

By HOMER RODEHEAVER
Billy Sunday's Tabernacle Choir Leader

YOU can sing the songs, for Rody's book gives them all in full, words and music, ready for the piano or organ. Homer Rodcheaver, who, as everybody knows, is Billy Sunday's choir leader, and who has a wonderful gift like that of Sankey, has written a book with the attractive title "Song Stories of the Sawdust Trail."

"Rody" in his book tells the story of his most famous songs—of which the words and music are familiar to hundreds of thousands of Americans who have listened with eagerness and delight to his singing and who have joined in the choruses. And each song has an individual history of its own. He tells how a humble, homekeeping woman, striving to "do something" for God, made herself and multitudes of others happy by writing the four simple, touching verses which the world knows as "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and which radiate the finest kind of practical Christian teaching. He relates how another song, "My Father Watches Over Me," sung at a mission service, called a poor, sink criminal and wanderer back to Christ and happiness. "Molly and the Baby," another of Rody's favorites, won a poor struggling drunkard back from his cups, and his evil associates, to his wife and family, and tells how all his former happiness was restored.

AFTER DEATH, WHAT?

By REV. MADISON C. PETERS

WHEN the late Dr. Klopsch published "After Death, What?" some years ago, the book was received with tremendous enthusiasm and the editions published by him were soon exhausted. Successive editions were not published, yet the demand through the intervening years has been large. For this reason we have thought it wise to bring out an entirely new edition of this wonderful book.

It is impossible to give more than the briefest glimpses of the rich character of the contents of this attractive volume. Among the subjects discussed are: "Does Death End All?" "Light After Darkness," "The Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "Heavenly Reunions," "The Joy and Comfort of Faith in Immortality," "Occupations in Heaven," "Our Children in Heaven," and many others, including poems of comfort and master minds on the life beyond. In addition to the above masterpieces of thought and literature, it contains a vast collection of golden gems from the greatest historians, philosophers, preachers and poets of all ages and nationalities on other phases of the future life.

CAP'N ABE, STOREKEEPER A CAPE COD STORY

By JAMES A. COOPER

DO you like to read about doings on Cape Cod, among the quaint characters who inhabit that locality? Would you like to read of what happened to a high-bred city girl when she suddenly landed down there to take up her living with a relative she had never seen? Would you like to read how loquacious Cap'n Abe, the storekeeper, who could tell more marvelous yarns than any other man on the Cape, suddenly disappeared, and of how his brother from "furrin parts" appeared to take his place?

Would you like to read about a most perplexing mystery that came near being turned into a tragedy, and of how a man who was a rank coward at heart forced himself to play the part of a hero? In this volume, humor and pathos are well mixed. Many of the doings along the Cape shore are taken from life. Tender love scenes are not lacking; and there is high excitement when a great storm wrecks a vessel off the coast and it looks as if some of the loved ones might be drowned.

To meet Cap'n Abe, is never to forget him.

How to Avoid Fevers

By DR. W. H. VAIL

WE KNOW no better definition of a fever than the following: "A fever is a general disorder of the system, characterized by an abnormally high temperature of the body, and commonly accompanied by shivering and chill at the beginning of the attack, followed by a quickened pulse and respiration, burning heat, thirst, loss of appetite and headache, wandering pains, and derangement of all the secretions and excretions."

This may seem a long definition, but it is impossible to omit a single clause without rendering it incomplete; and one reason for its length is that it is not a disease in itself, but only a symptom of a disease already existing in the body. Observe that it does not say a fever is a disease, but a "general disorder of the system." In this respect it differs from an inflammation, the latter being a disease of some locality; and yet in the great majority of cases of fever it is an inflammation somewhere that has acted as the cause of the fever. We define inflammation tersely enough. We define pneumonia as an inflammation of the lungs, gastritis as inflammation of the stomach, etc.

THERE are three classes of causes for the existence of fever in the system. In other words, there must be something wrong in the body before it is possible to have a fever. The first, and most common, cause of fever is the inflammation of some organ or portion of the body. The second class of causes is the presence in the system of some poison, not only located somewhere in the system, but operating there. This operating process is called fermentation, and this fermenting process causes inflammation; so that in this class of cases we also have inflammation, but here the inflammation is secondary, whereas, in the first class, the inflammation was the primary cause of the fever. We call these cases, where there exists fermentation, "zymotic fevers," for zymotic means to ferment. The third class of fevers arises from some disturbance of the nervous system. This class of cases can be produced at will upon the lower animals by stimulating certain parts of the great brain. This leads to a rise of temperature, with increased production of heat. This same condition may prevail in sunstroke, or other cases where the cause of the very high temperature acts suddenly and is obscure.

A FEVER not only weakens the patient through the suffering caused by its presence, but more so on account of the tissues of the body that are disintegrated and destroyed through its action in causing the high temperature; or, on the other hand, it may be that the process of disintegration and destruction of the tissues acts as the cause of the fever. In either case, the whole system suffers from the fever. All the organs of secretion and excretion suspend, to a greater or less extent, their functions. Hence the skin is hot and dry, and the first thing to do is to induce perspiration, because the act of perspiring immediately relieves the high temperature. Sixty years ago the practice was to allow a patient suffering from fever no water or cooling drinks. How differently we treat the sufferers now!

As a rule, the intensity of the fever as marked by the height of the temperature, indicates the degree of inflammation existing, even where the inflammation is secondary in character, as is the case where the fever is zymotic in its origin. Not only so, but the fever is an effort of nature to restore health by ridding the system of the poison which has gained an entrance and is developing mischief. We must remember that all inflammation and fevers are the efforts put forth by nature to eliminate certain poisons (either mechanical or zymotic), which have gained an entrance into the system; and this is an illustration of the old Roman proverb, "vis medicatrix naturæ," which means,

"the healing power of nature." We call attention to this proverb, for it expresses a fundamental truth which physicians are constantly summoning to their assistance. Doctors could accomplish little indeed in their sphere of usefulness without the aid of this power to assist them, as they attempt to relieve the ills of suffering humanity.

HAVING thus far considered the definition, nature, and causes of fevers, as well as having hinted somewhat, in general terms, as to their treatment, let us now come directly to the question of prevention of fevers, in order that we may learn how to avoid them. This brings us back to the only position that is rapidly gaining ground among progressive thinkers, and that is that our bodies always contain the two classes of microbes or germs—the benevolent and the malevolent—and that the processes of life, from the cradle to the grave consist of a constant conflict between these two classes. When the benevolent germs are in the ascendancy, we are well and everything prospers; but when the malevolent microbes have the upper hand, we are miserable, and everything puts on jaundiced hues. This concretely describes our condition from day to day. Again, we must not forget that as long as we maintain our health up to, or near, what we call par, we are immune to the ravages or inroads of the germs which would cause disease and death, whether through the processes of fevers or inflammations, or both. We know that not over half of the people who swallow the germs of typhoid fever suffer from the fever, and the inference is that those who fail to contract the disease, in spite of having swallowed the microbes, were immune from the fact that they were enjoying a state of health that enabled them to throw off the poison, instead of allowing it to remain in the system and, through the process of fermentation, to develop the fever. To the end that we may maintain this condition of immunity, it is of the utmost importance that we should eat only such food as shall be readily assimilated and masticated thoroughly what we eat, remembering that every atom of food that is placed in the stomach, not in condition to be readily assimilated, lowers the system below par just to that extent and renders it subject to the inroads of whatever poisonous germs may gain an entrance into the system, whether with our food or through the air we breathe. Live in the fresh air as much as possible. Lastly, do not worry, for worry is one of the insidious causes of fever.

The Thrift Stamp Catechism

IF I do not have enough money saved up to buy a War-Savings Stamp and can only save in small amounts, what should I do?

A. Buy a 25-cent Thrift Stamp at a post office, bank, or other authorized agency and ask for a Thrift Card, to which you can attach your Thrift Stamp.

Q. Is there any charge for a Thrift Card?

A. No. It is given you to hold Thrift Stamps and contains a place for your name and address.

Q. How many Thrift Stamps will this card hold?

A. Sixteen stamps, which represents a value of $4.

Q. When I have filled the Thrift Card, what do I do?

A. Take it to a post office, bank, or other authorized agency, surrender the card and pay in cash the few cents' difference between the $4 worth of Thrift Stamps and the price of a War-Savings Stamp for the month in which the exchange is made.

Q. What do I do next?

A. You take the War-Savings Stamp given you in exchange for your Thrift Card, ask for a War-Savings Certificate, if you haven't one already, and attach the stamp to the certificate.

COLONELS AND KERNELS. Uncle Sam says a good selection of Colonels for the army is not much more important than a good selection of kernels for next year's seed corn.—The Journal of Agriculture.

Helping the War Sufferers in Bible Lands

BEFORE Christmas, the publisher of the Sabbath School Bode, of Paterson, N. J., suggested to the Sunday schools of the Christian Reformed Church of America a plan to ask all the scholars if they would be willing to do without their annual treat of candy at the Christmas entertainment, in order to donate this money for the benefit of the war sufferers of Bible Lands in Armenia, Syria, etc. The response was whole-hearted and liberal, as shown by the following list of contributions. Besides, some of the churches sent their collections through local treasurers to the Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief at New York.

A certified check for $2,000 on the Second National Bank of Paterson, N. J., to the order of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief at New York, made by James Tanis, publisher, the Sabbath School Bode, has been received by the Christian Herald and forwarded to the Committee. Mr. Tanis, in his letter accompanying the same, says: "I anticipate a few more collections which have not yet reached me, before I finally close this little campaign. I thank you in advance and wish you God's richest blessings on all your valuable labors through the Christian Herald."

She "Wanted to Be Somebody"

READERS of the Christian Herald may remember Jennie S., the lame girl who came to Mayesville Industrial Institute a few years ago without shoes and with no clothing save what she had on. Her condition was a pitiable one. She said, after her pastor had told her about Mayesville School, "I jes' want to come so bad, and jes' prayed to the Lord that you would let me come to your school, so I can get an education."

She was asked if her mother and father were living. "No, ma'am," she said: "I ain't got no mother and no father." "How do you make your living?" she was asked. "I work in the field," she said, "when it don't rain, so my crutch won't stick in the mud."

"Where did you get the money to pay your way here?" "Oh, my preacher he take a collection in the church for me an' got three dollars, and the nex' day preacher come for me an' we got on the train and come to Mayesville, to your school."

When told that she could not enter school without money to pay her board, buy books, shoes and clothes, she began to cry and begged not to be sent away. So she was taken. Jennie was a smart, bright girl, and, though she can not walk a step without her crutch, she is willing to do all she can to help herself. She chose dressmaking as her trade, and was soon able to sew well. "Oh," she said, "Miss Wilson, I gwine do all I kin to make myself somebody."

Jennie was wonderfully helped during her stay in the Mayesville Institute, and has carried back to her home and people a vision of the beautiful spirit of service.

To make this girl "somebody" had required not only equipment and the teaching services of the Institute, but also, back of that, the financial support to accomplish that end. Such support was not lacking in Jennie's case. She came to Mayesville a dependent cripple; she left Mayesville a self-supporting woman.

There are many other dependent and needy girls who are coming and want to come to Mayesville, asking for education and guidance to make them better and more capable of fighting the battle of life. Readers of the Christian Herald who are interested in aiding this worthy work may address the superintendent, Miss Emma Wilson, care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C.

With all the resources of the Government libraries and departments and of the public museums and their staffs and with the active assistance of national experts, this Information Bureau is ready to tell you the answer to

Whatever You Want to Know

The bureau is prepared to answer fully and promptly questions regarding food production and conservation, transportation, industrial activities, history, patents and inventions, pensions and Army insurance, legislation, exploration and discovery, Government employment and all of the thousand and one things that you want to be sure of.

Inquiries must be accompanied by a stamp to cover postage on the reply. Answers to questions of general interest will be published in this page. Watch this page for special offers of helpful material.

A GREAT many people have misunderstood the above instructions. Hundreds of questions directed to the Christian Herald Information Bureau have been addressed to the Christian Herald in New York City. This entails delay, added postage and unnecessary work, for a staff already working at full capacity. Mail all inquiries on subjects other than religious questions to Washington and do not omit the three-cent stamp. It is a small price for a great service.

Other hundreds of letters relative to subscription matters have been sent to the Christian Herald Information Bureau in Washington. This again entails delay, unnecessary work and added postage and increases the liability of error. The Information Bureau knows nothing about your subscription and cannot serve you there; it knows nothing about books offered for sale or about the Bible Picture Study or the Christian Herald Charities. It does know a great deal and is prepared to put its hand upon a great deal more about matters of general interest, and it is ready to serve you quickly if you will make use of its facilities according to the announcement above.

Questions and Answers

J. E. S., Houston, Texas. Does God hear and answer prayer, and will he protect his children that are born of the Spirit of God? I know that God does hear and answer prayer, and that he is with his children and does care for them, and protect them. I hear it often said that when you ask God in prayer for anything, he will give you something. In John 14:13, the Lord says, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son." In the next verse: "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it." In the 13th verse he says, "that will I do." In the 14th verse, "I will do it." Does the Lord promise to do that which we ask and then not do it? "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." I firmly believe that the Lord means what he says.

As an earthly father, who loves his children, may withhold from them at times things which they ask that would hurt rather than help, so our Heavenly Father, in his wisdom, answers many prayers not in the way we expected, yet in a far better way. He knows best what is meet for us. This is the experience of the great majority of earnest Christians. We are urged to bring our requests to God, but with every prayer there must be the willing assent: "Not as I will, but as thou wilt." Our prayers are apt to be selfish and material, and to run chiefly in the line of our desires. Such prayers, if answered, would be more likely to prove hurtful than helpful. We must pray in accordance with God's will, unselfishly, and for those things that are pleasing to him, and which we ask through our love for Christ and our fellow men. The believer should ask that he may not pray amiss, through the wish to indulge more worldly longings. Prayers of that class assuredly do not come within the category of acceptable prayer.

R. C. T., Evansville, Ind. The gold monetary stock (coin and bullion used as money) in the United States on Nov. 1, 1917, is estimated in Secretary McAdoo's annual report at $3,041,500,000. The increase in the past ten months has been $174,000,000, and in the past three years $1,236,500,000. In five years, the portion of the world's gold monetary stock held by the United States has increased from approximately one-fifth to more than one-third.

S. T. C., Burlington, Vt. Estimates by the Geological Survey indicate that the quantity of petroleum produced and marketed in the oil fields of the United States in 1917 reached the record-breaking total of 341,800,000 barrels, a quantity nearly 14 per cent. greater than the former record output of 300,767,158 barrels in 1916.

Mrs. C. E., Le Sueur, Minn. In seating the guests at a golden wedding dinner, the wife and husband take either end of the table, the minister being seated at the right of the hostess. The children and other guests may be seated as you desire.

J. H. K., Mancos, Colo. Forty years is the maximum age limit for chaplains in the army. A chaplain is appointed as a first lieutenant, with a salary of $2,000 per year and an allowance of $150 for the maintenance of one horse. He is also allowed quarters, light and heat. Candidates must be able to pass a physical and mental examination. Chaplains have charge of religious services and the performance of any baptismal, marriage and funeral services which they may be called upon to perform. For application blanks and information regarding the mental examination, apply to Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C.

L. J. F. and family, South Cortland, N. Y., write: "Reading in the Christian Herald of January 9, the article 'I Am that Clown,' the need of money for the Bowery Mission prompted us to take a little collection in our family (with the children's pennies, etc.) to do our bit. Enclosed find money order for $1.50."

Anxious, Bloomfield, Ill. The passage in Gen. 3:22 is rendered somewhat difficult by an obscure translation, the better reading according to Jamieson, Fausset and Brown, being: "Behold what has become of the man who was as one of us," how he who was formed in the divine image has fallen from his righteous estate. Then, lest a worse evil should befall, and lest "he put forth his hand and take of the tree of life and live forever," the expulsion from Eden followed. Originally there was no prohibition except as to the one forbidden tree. All the trees of the garden were at their disposal, except the tree of knowledge (see Gen. 2:16, 17). The tree of life, as commentators hold, was for a constant renewal of youth and vitality—a privilege now cut off through disobedience. The tree of life is first mentioned in Gen. 2:9.

J. O., Lancaster, Pa. Antinomianism is the heresy which teaches that, since Christ kept the whole moral law for all his followers, they themselves are free from its requirements. It is strange that earnest students of the Bible should have been led into this error. The heresy began early in the history of the Church, was taught again in Luther's time by Agricola, and broke out in later eras. One of its most notable and victorious antagonists was John Fletcher. His "Checks to Antinomianism" have been referred to as so complete and powerful an attack on this heresy as to have killed it for all time. So far as we know, there have been no serious outbreaks of it since his day.

A Little Benefactor

ON a bitter cold day during "zero week" in January, a kindly-faced lady entered the Bowery Mission. To the assistant superintendent, Mr. Baker, she handed an envelope. "This is a gift from my little son," she explained. "He's just nine years old, and hearing us talking about the sufferings of the homeless in this frightfully cold weather, he immediately offered to give the balance of his Christmas money to help the poor men of the Bowery and keep them from freezing."

The gift was received with thanks. The envelope contained $5.25, the offering of Master Tevis Reyburn, of Woodland Shore, Phoenicia, N. Y. It served to pay for warm beds for thirty-five homeless men that night, and in their humble prayers their little benefactor was not forgotten.

"Soldiers of the Sea"

THE Marine Corps is in many ways the most interesting body of fighting men in the world.

They are seeing service all the time and everywhere—east and west, north and south, from the tropics to the Arctic.

The American people ought to know more about the Marine Corps. They are stationed in Nicaragua, they cleaned up Haiti and Santo Domingo, they are policing Cuba, they were "first in France."

Free Art Book on the Corps

A new edition of the popular art booklet on the United States Marine Corps has just been issued. From cover to cover it is a work of art and packed with interesting information. Full page color reproductions of paintings, unusual photographs of war work, all about the service.

These men are fighting for the United States right now. Don't you owe it to them and to your country to know a little more about them?

Send for the art booklet today. It's a book worth treasuring for its pictures alone—and it tells about our own fighting men.

HALF AS MANY PICTURES TWICE AS MUCH PLEASURE

IN THE THIRD NATIONAL BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

A NEW POLICY was inaugurated by the Christian Herald with its Third National Bible Picture Study—that of making each Picture Study short, simple, extremely pleasurable.

In the First and Second Bible Picture Studies 60 pictures were presented each time. In the Third Bible Picture Study there are only 30 pictures in the series!

That means, of course, that the Third Bible Picture Study requires half as much time as the others, half as much comparing of pictures and verses—but that the pleasure is doubled.

We hope to have many more Bible Picture Studies, in each of which a short course will be given, and thus those who enter each Study will, in easy, simple, enjoyable competitions, gain just as much Bible knowledge ultimately.

THE CASH REWARDS, of course, like the Scripture rewards, are just as great as before. In this Third Bible Picture Study $5,000.00 in cash, divided into 1,001 rewards, will be given those who submit the Bible verses best illustrated by the 30 pictures.

The fun of the Bible Picture Studies—for they are so fascinating that it is fun to compete in them—is also much greater, for naturally the interest is kept fresh and keen in finding the best verses for 30 pictures, where if the number were doubled the crisp eagerness of the search might be worn off.

We can never have too much of Bible knowledge, and the Christian Herald believes in keeping its Bible Picture Studies pulsing from beginning to end with vital interest. That is accomplished by making each Bible Picture Study short and rapid.

Announcing the Winners

BUT one-half the time will be required, after the completion of this Third Bible Picture Study, to announce the winners, for it will take one-half the time to check over the sets of only 30 pictures each that was required to check over the 60-picture sets in the previous Studies.

So enter, every one of you, enjoy the Picture Study every moment, and submit your set of verses with the knowledge that you will know the result, so far as distribution of the cash rewards is concerned, in record time!

Can you imagine a better use for your idle time than this? Do you know of a more effective way to gain solid, lasting knowledge of the Bible?

The Christian Herald invites each one of you to enter now, and experience the great joy of the National Bible Picture Study.

Don't Think Only of Yourself!

Only 10 cents added to the subscription price of the Christian Herald will bring the complete Outfit. If you do not wish, for any reason, to enter the delightful and helpful Picture Study yourself, then secure the Outfit when sending in your subscription, and give it to some one who will appreciate it and find joy and gain in competing. This is a simple and yet very effective way in which you can spread Bible knowledge and induce a study of Bible truth. Read the offers below. Doesn't one fit your case—or appeal to you for some one else?

How to Compete in the National Bible Picture Study

THE Bible Picture Study consists of three things:

1. A series of 30 pictures, which appear in the Christian Herald. When ordering the Outfit you will be sent all pictures that have been published up to the time your subscription starts. We guarantee you all 30 pictures.
2. A reference book, called International Bible Readings, which contains about 2,000 Bible verses, chosen from among the 31,101 verses in the Bible. All verses submitted for the pictures must be selected from those which we republish in the Reference Book.
3. An Answer Book, in which to write down and submit the verses best illustrated by the 30 pictures.

Your endeavor will be to choose from the Reference Book the best verses for the 30 pictures. Those excelling at this simple yet fascinating task will receive the cash rewards.

GET THE HANDY OUTFIT

TO the right are the offers we make for the Christian Herald and the complete Outfit. One of these offers surely fits your case.

The Reference Book, International Bible Readings, is not a haphazard selection of Bible verses, but the actual International Sunday School Lessons, Golden Texts and Daily Home Bible Readings, published in full, for the five months starting December, 1917, and going through April, 1918. Thus while competing in the Picture Study you will be memorizing the Bible stories chosen by the eminent Lesson Committee, and in the Reference Book you will have a helpful volume which you will treasure for itself.

Or if you secure the Outfit to give away, think what a joy the International Bible Readings will be to some one else, who perhaps may gain light and understanding from its pages.

Do not delay about obtaining the Outfit. Competition without expense is made possible under the rules, free on request. Order at once.

SPECIAL OUTFIT OFFERS

ALL FOR $2.10

First aid in every household—Musterole

Cough, cough, cough. How it racks little Dorothy and passes on to mother and grandma and holds a croup danger for all the little ones!

Hurry, there, with the Musterole, that pure, white ointment that is better than a mustard plaster—and it will not bring a blister. Massage it gently over the chest and neck. Feel the tingle, then the cool delightfulness as Musterole searches down. It will penetrate, never fear. It will rout that old congestion clear away.

Musterole is a pure, white ointment made from oil of mustard and a few home simples! Musterole searches in under the skin down to the heart of the congestion. There it generates a peculiar congestion-dispersing heat. Yet this heat will not blister. On the contrary you feel a relieving sense of delightful coolness. Rub Musterole over the spot. And you get relief while you use it; for Musterole results usually follow immediately.

On no account fail to have a jar of Musterole handy. For coughs and colds and even the congestions of rheumatism or lumbago Musterole is wonderful.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole. 30c and 60c jars—$2.50 hospital size.

Young People's Topics for February 24

The Power of the Cross in Asia

Christian Endeavor Topic. Psalm 96:1-13

A LITTLE over a century ago Asia knew of the Cross only as a legend dimly remembered. Then Carey from England went to India, Judson from America went to Burmah and later other pioneers of the Cross entered Japan, China, Korea, Manchuria, Malaysia, and Siam, while a steady stream of consecrated men and women followed, establishing schools, hospitals, preaching, living a new life, a life that seemed to have a blessing in it. For a long time, almost a generation, the walls of heathenism held against the power of the Cross, then one by one, then by tens, then by hundreds and finally, as in Korea and India, by thousands, the people came crowding into the kingdom, came seeking to hear about the Jesus child who had become the Saviour of mankind.

What is the power of the Cross then in Asia? It is the same power that it is in America, the power to transform lives, to make saints of sinners, to turn selfishness into selflessness, to replace greed with gracious helpfulness, to plant the will to give in place of the desire to get, to defeat temptation and to develop both an individual and a national conscience. Today, Christian men stand high in the state councils of Japan; Korea, two generations ago corrupt and vile and ignorant and decaying, is today, swept by evangelism, awake, turned from its superstitions to the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, an orderly, prosperous, school crowding, truth seeking nation. China's republic was born in the mission schools and professing Christians are prominent in the councils of the new state, throughout Malaysia cannibalism has practically ceased, and in India the leaven of Christ is beginning to break down the barriers of caste, the lower castes are coming in masses to the Saviour, seeking baptism and instruction and the higher castes are beginning to be touched by the Gospel.

The leader of this meeting will do well to write to the mission board of his church for material to make this topic vivid and vital to his society.

Torch Bearers of Africa

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Isa. 52:7; Rom. 10:15

IN the January missionary meeting a glimpse was given of the strategic situation of Africa, of the struggle between Christ and Mohammed for the soul of the black man. No battle can be fought without leaders. In this meeting you should meet the men who are directing the assault of the Gospel on the darkness of Africa's heathenism. There are some illustrious names. Write to the Department of Missionary Education, 23 E. 26th St., New York City, enclosing 10c. and you will receive complete and inspiring information about this topic.

Our Duty as Americans

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 13:1-7; Josh. 1:6, 7

IT is a cardinal principle of Christianity that full honor and obedience is to be given to the civil powers of the State. The Christian is to be more loyal than he who is not a disciple, he is to keep all of the law, and he is to keep it as unto Christ. What then is the immediate duty of American Christians in this present year of war? America has gone to war calmly, without any passion except the passion for national righteousness and the freedom of democratic government which is her heritage and the central fire of her life. America's sword is drawn that men everywhere may be free. Christ died that men might be saved from sin. Americans will die this year, and perhaps next year and the year after, that men may be unfettered by governments not of their own choosing. Our duty then as American Christians is to give every last ounce of our power of mind and heart and muscle to this cause which, now, is the one great business of our people. Let us make our every minute support the nation's great endeavor, scrupulously observing every request of those charged with the nation's authority and striving to go even further in sacrifice than we are asked to go. Let us be loyally wheatless, meatless, porkless, eatless if necessary, but never faithless. But also, let us be sure that we do not fail in loyalty to Christ, let us strive even more than formerly to make our lives approved in his sight; for, when the war is over, lives strong in the strength of God, founded in faith, tempered by sacrificial love, will be needed to bring back to the world justice, righteousness, real freedom and the healing touch of mutual forgiveness that will bury enmities and re-cement friendships.

Miss Bentley's Valentine

A SILENCE fell on the little room. And then suddenly, from behind me, I heard a sob, and the old colored woman, the sullenness wiped miraculously from her black face, shuffled forward and knelt beside the bed. Her hand was like a blot on the whiteness of the coverlet.

"Oh, Miz Bentley, honey," she said, "it's been years—"

The figure on the bed stirred uneasily. The voice, a very gasping voice, spoke—"Sixty years," said the voice. And then, "I love you!"

I went softly to the other side of the bed. Softly I knelt.

I looked at Miss Bentley, lying there so quietly. And I knew that I was facing a psychological moment—a moment when I should speak to her heart. I knew that a minister of the Gospel would have prayed over her, would have quoted comforting Scripture. But the somberness of that little room had laid its chill upon my very soul, and I found that I couldn't say what I most wanted to say. Only to myself I kept repeating over and over—"O God, let her know how you love her! Don't let her die without knowing!" And I reached out until my hand touched the hand under the covers, the thin hand that was clenched above a pasteboard heart.

Perhaps I knelt there half an hour—I'm not sure. The only sound in the room was the sound of the woman's labored breathing, and the sobbing sighs of her old servant. And then suddenly, gloriously, God answered my prayer. For Miss Bentley, who had never moved in sixty years, sat suddenly erect. There was a wonderful, seeing expression on her face. And her hands came out from underneath the covers as if some magnet drew them. And she extended them toward something past the foot of the bed—Something that I couldn't see.

"Loves-me!" she said. And then all at once, marvelously, I saw sixty years of pain and bitterness wiped from a face, leaving the face of a white-haired little child—a little child who knew that there was a God, and trusted him.

"Now I lay me," said Miss Bentley clearly, "down to sleep—I pray—the Lord—my—soul . . . to—keep . . ."

The message of love had reached her soul at last.

Vapo Cresolene

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs.

Established 1879

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs. Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it tips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold. Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp." The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers. For the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and as an aid in the treatment of Diphtheria, Cresolene is valuable on account of its powerful germicidal qualities. It is a protection in these exposures.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 38 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

A Finish for Every Surface

Made to best meet the wear that each surface gets

NEVER in the history of paint and painting has quality-in-paint been so important as now. At the present prices no man can buy carelessly or be indifferent as to results. Nor can any man afford to put off painting that is necessary.

Obviously the paint to buy is that which will go farthest and endure longest—any other kind is wasteful.

The Sherwin-Williams business has been built upon the sound principle that a finish best serves its purpose when made in a particular way for a particular surface. To that end it has studied surfaces, the kind of wear they get and the use they serve, and made a special product for each.

It is this specializing that guarantees for you the maximum of durability in any Sherwin-Williams finish you buy.

Tell the Sherwin-Williams dealer the surface you wish to protect and he will see that you get the right product for your purpose.

Sherwin-Williams House Paint is made for the exterior of buildings only. It contains just the right proportion of pure lead, zinc and linseed oil to give it great covering power and unusual weather resisting qualities. When properly applied, Sherwin-Williams House Paint will not crack, peel or chalk off.

Measured by the years of protection it affords, it is the most economical paint you can buy.

Blond Eskimos of the Mackenzie River country, the parishioners of Missionary Girling

Civilizing the Blond Eskimo

A Great Change in a Race Redeemed from Cruelty, Immorality and Gross Superstition

By WILLIAM THOMPSON

IT is said that the Russian peasant is among the most superstitious of all mankind; but the Eskimo, un-Christianized (and this applies to all the Arctic Coast tribes of Coronation Gulf), has superstition woven into the very fabric of his nature. If he has killed a bear with a rifle, he must not kill a deer with it. He will not use an implement if a woman has stepped over it. A dead whale or seal, when brought ashore, must have a drink. If he moves into a house by the door, he must go out by the skylight. If a child has died, the father stands guard around the igloo with a snow knife, to keep evil spirits away. He will not drive nails at that time. If he wants work done, another Eskimo will do it for him. After the birth of an infant, the female has new clothes made for herself and the child of caribou skin. She builds a snow igloo and goes into it alone to bear her infant. Few have been known to die at this time. The mother stays in the igloo for a month; no one is allowed to go near her. After the expiration of the month, all the bedding and clothing she has used are buried under a stone.

Conjurors and medicine men give advice and cast out evil spirits. They are paid in skins, rifles, or any other article which comes in daily use among these people. Some of the "swells" of the tribe wear a belt with decorations of sealskin, ribbons of different colors and little dolls made of ivory attached. There is a goddess of the sea and a goddess of the land, both very large and very strong.

When a member of a tribe dies, only the next of kin will attend the funeral services. When they bury, if in winter, they take the body on a sled, conveying it to a small island or promontory. Here they build a grave of rocks and place therein the body. Just before covering, the lashing around the body is cut. All the effects of the deceased are left at the grave, and often presents are brought. They mourn for a month, and the nearest relatives abstain from meat and other specified articles of food during that time.

IT was the custom a generation ago to cut great gashes or holes in the lower lip, and insert stones there. A few of the older generation can still be seen at Herschel Island and Fort McPherson disfigured in this manner. The women of two or three generations past wore a large labret in the middle of the under lip, as is the custom of many South Sea Islanders. The size of the hole increased as the woman grew older, necessitating a larger ornament. To kill a fellow man was to gain the right to tattoo the face from the mouth to the ears. The women had their lower lips tattooed, as do the Maoris of New Zealand. In 1900 nearly all girl babies were put in the snow to die, although sometimes a humane parent would spare the child. This practice has not been known since 1901. In 1900 a native might have two or three wives. If a woman could make a sealskin boot that was watertight she would be eligible as a wife. The older wife would look after the camp, the younger would bear the children.

In Herschel Island, where the sun shines continuously for eight weeks in summer, they would have a sun-dance, not always clothed in the garments of propriety. They had an idea that when the sun came back its movements were directed by an invisible power, but they had no tangible conception of a God. They had no belief in a future life, either of reward or punishment. Today they are religious, truthful, kind to their children and to the aged. They are ambitious to learn; they are practical, extremely industrious, sanitary in their habits, well clothed and well housed. Insanity is unknown, but tuberculosis is quite common.

They whale in summer and trap in winter. They are clever in trading, good workers on land, water and ice, and take excellent care of their household effects. Tools if broken are neatly repaired. When at Herschel Island or Fort McPherson they eat the white man's food with great relish. In summer they eat their fish and blubber raw and in winter frozen. They like food cooked, but it is a matter of indifference to them. They will barter for the white man's food, eat a hearty meal of it, and then go out and eat blubber and raw fish as dessert. The contents of a deer's stomach they consider a great delicacy.

The Eskimos have no fear of death; if told that death is approaching they will respond with a complacent smile. They are even more stoical than the Mongolian. Trouble does not affect them at all. They are a very happy people. Their natures are childlike, and they do not continue in the same frame of mind for two minutes at a time. They are good-natured and humorous and very inquisitive. Their emotions are sudden and short-lived—uproariously happy one moment and almost crying the next. Their faces are now wreathed in smiles, now a picture of woe.

The Eskimos of the Delta and Coast are almost white. Their conceit is gigantic, for they call themselves "Inuits," which means "The men of the whole world." They think the Northern Lights are spirits of the dead playing with the head of a walrus. The example of Mr. Bompas influenced the younger and older generations for good. His constant and untiring effort for their welfare convinced them of his absolute sincerity.

IN 1892 Isaac O. Stringer, a classmate at Toronto University of the Rev. Canon S. Gould, secretary-general of the Missionary Society of the Church of England of Canada, was taking a theological course at Wycliffe College. He responded to a call to locate at Fort McPherson, was ordained, and entered the work with the zeal which has characterized his efforts for the past twenty-seven years. He has since been made Bishop of Yukon. Services were held by him at trading-posts to which the Eskimos came to dispose of their furs. He made visits to their settlements winter and summer, also making periodical trips to Herschel Island in the Arctic Ocean, a journey perilous in the extreme, covering a distance of four hundred and forty miles from Fort McPherson and return. He traveled with bands of Eskimos during their spring migration. He has several times escaped death at the hands of fanatics, as well as by exposure to the elements, having made journeys of from two to three thousand miles by dog team.

In 1897 this devoted man took charge of the mission at Herschel Island, situated near the seventy-seventh parallel north latitude, and but thirteen degrees from the North Pole, it being the most northerly Protestant mission, and also the winter quarters of the whaling fleet. The conditions at Herschel on the arrival of Bishop Stringer were very distressing. Immorality was everywhere prevalent among the whalers, liquor was traded or freely given, and an hour after the arrival of a ship the rational, sober population was turned into a mob of howling, drunken men, women and children.

THE influence of the missionaries, who were steadfast in their belief that these conditions could not always prevail, gradually brought about a change for the better, and at Fort McPherson in 1917 I saw two or three hundred Eskimos and not one of them intoxicated.

Bishop Stringer has been a benefactor and a great father to the Eskimos of the Coast and Delta. He has been mentor to those who sought his advice in matters both spiritual and temporal. He has nursed the sick, made coffins for the dead, dug their graves, and officiated at the last rites for the departed. In 1909 he visited the scenes of his earliest labors at Kittigaguiut in the Delta, and instead of finding a dependent, begging people, as he had left them, the mission party were the recipients of every attention and extravagant hospitality possible at the hands of the Eskimos.

During the winter of 1910, Explorer Stefansson, writing from some point to the north of Great Bear Lake, reported the discovery of a large number of Eskimos hitherto supposed to have been unknown, but without doubt belonging to the tribe Kilnermum from the Coppermine River region.

IT was Bishop Stringer's wish to establish a mission among these unknown people. He commissioned Rev. W. Henry Fry, now of Herschel Island, who was ordained for the work and who, with several "Huskies," left Herschel Island in the mission schooner Tiliyak (meaning "Messenger") for the voyage of 1,380 miles. The expedition resulted in the establishment of the St. Andrew's Mission at Beruad Harbor, 690 miles from the eastern boundary of the diocese of the Mackenzie River. Rev. H. Girling, one of the most intrepid missionaries that ever went to the North, is now among the "Blond Eskimos," and in charge of this mission.

IN 1916 Girling's boat, the "Atkon," burned on the Arctic coast near Clifton Point, after running on a reef. The crew was saved but narrowly escaped death. Most of the provisions and outfit were saved.

There is a divergence of opinion regarding the evangelization of the Eskimos. Explorer Amundsen came in contact with ten different tribes during the voyage of the "Gjøa," when he was negotiating the Northwest Passage. His conclusion was that the Eskimo who is entirely isolated from civilization of any kind is the most honorable, the healthiest and the most contented. Admiral Peary and Explorer Stefansson concur in this opinion.

It is difficult, however, to believe that the religion of the people of the Arctic is only, as Stefansson calls it, an "Eskimo-ized Christianity" when one has such evidence as the following prayer translated by the Rev. E. Hester of Fort McPherson. The prayer was written by an Eskimo who is a confirmed cripple, and who, a few years ago, was an enemy of the white man's creed.

Prayer

"To you, the God of Truth and Light and Love; to you I speak; to you, who are highest, holiest and noblest. Now I know there is bad within me; when you see it, forget. I am just like others of my people. We were afraid of the spirits. Our chief aim was to get food and fur, to make our bodies comfortable. In this we were little more than beasts, who want only a warm place to lie down in with a full belly. From the beginning we lived in fear, in ignorance and in darkness; but now, from afar, we see light rising; but, alas! in the faint light we see the filth of our lives. We understand that you are our Father, whose heart is bursting with love for us; that you love all truth and mercy, light, cleanness and goodness; and that you hate the false and the dark, the cruel, the unclean and the bad. So, we pray, make the light brighter, that we may see more clearly and learn more of you. Cause us to hate that which you hate and to love that which you love. Father, I and my people will be strong for you. We will fight against the bad; we will fight for the good only; we will use our head, our heart, our hands and our feet, our tongue and all that we have, to follow truth, to gratify and please you. Amen."

Is not such an inspiration from the mind of an aboriginal proof that the "Kabluna's" Christianity is comprehensible to the Eskimo?

NOT a little discussion was caused by this Manifesto when it first reached the United States, and some people feared it would create a religious panic. However, the memory of it is now so dim that it needs to be recalled, even for the purpose of this article.

What kind of men were they who put it forth? Not a fanatic nor a crank among them, not a pacifist, nor a slacker so far as the writer's acquaintance goes. There were among them Anglican clergymen of the first rank in character, in preaching eminence, and in administrative ability. One of the signers was the editor of a widely known religious journal. One had held the highest office within the gift of the great Baptist denomination which he honors. Another had been the president of a Congregational theological college. One is the pastor of the most noted church in Christendom. Two or three were men on whose lips have hung thousands of American auditors at the Bible conferences at Northfield, Montrose, Winona, Mountain Lake Park and elsewhere. Their books have been among the best sellers in the United States and Great Britain and her colonies. Some of us have crossed the ocean to listen to these men at Keswick. They have the respect and confidence of tens of thousands of Christians all over the world.

II

WHAT did these men say? Here are their seven points. Let us look at them:

1. The present crisis points toward the close of the Times of the Gentiles.
2. The revelation of our Lord may be expected at any moment, when he will be manifested to his disciples.
3. The completed Church will be translated to be forever with the Lord.
4. Israel will be restored to its own land in unbelief, and be afterward converted by the appearance of Christ on its behalf.
5. All human schemes of reconstruction must be subsidiary to the second coming of our Lord, because all nations will then be subject to his rule.
6. Under the reign of Christ there will be a further great effusion of the Holy Spirit upon all flesh.
7. The truths embodied in this statement are of the utmost practical value in determining Christian character and action with reference to the pressing problems of the hour.

N. B.—This is a general statement, which does not profess to decide on particular details of prophetic interpretation.

The English Manifesto on the Second Advent

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

III

WITH what do we find fault in the above, and why?

(1) Does not the present crisis point "toward the close of the times of the Gentiles?" But what is meant by "the times of the Gentiles?" people say. That's the point. People, even Christian people, are so lacking in understanding of the Bible that they do not know what "the times of the Gentiles" means. There is before the writer's eyes just now a counter-manifesto by the representative of a great religious body in this country which straightly declares that these men "issued a prediction of the speedy end of the world!" Such blindness (the author of the words did not mean to speak falsely) would be unbelievable, had we not been accustomed to it on the part of so-called Christian leaders for a long while. But these English ministers predicted no such thing. Every one of them knows, and most of them are in print to the effect, that even if "the times of the Gentiles" were altogether run, at least a thousand years would intervene before the end of the world. Let us keep steady, therefore, and not rock the boat.

(2) May not the Lord be expected at any moment? Did he not say, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man" (Mark 13:32)? Has not the attitude of watching been that of the faithful Church from the beginning? But it is only those who are ignorant of, or else deny, the dispensational teaching of the Bible who associate his coming with the end of the world.

(3) Will not "the completed Church" be translated to "be forever with the Lord?" What Christian questions the teaching of I Thess. 4:16-18 on that point?

(4) Will not Israel "be restored to its own land?" If there were never a Bible prophecy that spoke of it, who can read the current newspapers and remain in doubt about it? And if restored, will it not be "in unbelief?" Who will affirm that all the Jews will become Christians before they return to Palestine? And if afterward they shall be "converted by the appearance of Christ on their behalf," what is there in that to cause panic? Was not Saul of Tarsus converted thus? And has not his conversion proven the greatest blessing to the world? And does not he say that "if the casting away of them (the Jews) be the reconciling of the world (as it was by the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles), what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" (Romans 11:15). Could the world today covet a greater blessing than the salvation of the Jewish nation by whatever means? Will it not be to the world as life from the dead?

(5) The real trouble with the Manifesto begins at the fifth point, which has been grossly misunderstood. Some have supposed that it advocated a cessation of the war without settling anything. But these men are speaking only of what will be true when Christ comes. They are not discouraging enlistments, nor the purchase of Liberty Bonds. They are not urging the shutting down of the ammunition factories nor the weakening of the British lines, nor the withdrawal of the fleet from the North Sea. These men are reasonable men. They are patriots. They are suffering for their country gladly. They have given of their sons to die for it, and they are ready to die for themselves. But if all men believed as they do, that "human schemes of reconstruction must be subsidiary to the second coming of our Lord, because all nations will then be subject to his rule," what would follow? In that case all men would be looking up to him for wisdom and patience and guidance at this crucial hour, and would not that be better than trusting simply in themselves?

That is what the Manifesto means, and that is all it means, when it says at the seventh point (the sixth may be omitted for the present), "that the truths embodied in this statement are of the utmost practical value in determining Christian character and action with reference to the pressing problems of the hour." Certainly if they are truths that is the fact; and if they are not, it might easily be shown from the Bible, one would think.

IV

THE question arises, Was the putting forth of the Manifesto at this time and in that way an act of wisdom? We are inclined to answer, No; not because its utterances are untrue, nor because they are controversial; but because it came (a) without any explanation, (b) at a time of unprecedented world excitement, and (c) upon a public, even a Christian public, which, with comparatively few exceptions, was unable to adjust its thinking to its claims.

A serious assertion this, and one which needs a supporting witness, which we find happily in Professor Walter A. Athearn in a current issue of the Christian Educator. Professor Athearn is well known in

The liner Tuscania, torpedoed February 5, while transporting American troops

U-Boat Torpedoes the Tuscania

ON February 6, the cables brought the startling news of the sinking of one of our army transports, the Anchor liner, Tuscania, which had been torpedoed off the northern coast of Ireland, with the loss of 166 lives of which 147 were American soldiers. Her captain was Peter McLean and she was manned by a British crew and had been assigned to the American transport service, being on her first trip, with 2,179 American troops and a crew of 222. She was struck at dusk, about 6 o'clock on Tuesday evening, February 5th, when in sight of the Irish coast. It is said that one torpedo missed, but the second struck her amidships, near No. 1 boiler, and the great liner at once took a strong list to starboard, but remained afloat for two hours, affording time for the transfer of those on board to the rescue ships and destroyers which came promptly in answer to the wireless call.

With the impact of the torpedo, the lights on the big liner were immediately extinguished. For a few moments there was confusion; then discipline asserted itself and the soldiers and crew assembled at their boat stations. There was nothing like panic on the deck of the vessel at any time. Promptly the ship's officers got control of the situation, and the military co-operated. The American soldiers lined up on one side of the vessel, while the British crew stood at attention on the opposite side, lined along the rail. It was a tense moment. The boats were being launched, and swift preparations were being made to escape from the sinking vessel which had now an increasing list. An American soldier raised his voice and began singing "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." Strong and full came the notes, but he had not finished more than the first line of the national hymn, when his comrades, all up and down the deck, took it up and swelled the strain. Facing them, the Britishers sang to the same tune the words of "God Save the King." After this outburst of song, which seemed to steady the nerves of all on board, the work of lowering the starboard lifeboats went on with energy. A few men ran with eager haste to get seats, but there was no excitement. Some in their hurry missed the boats and fell into the icy water. One or two of the first series of boats capsized while they were being manned and lowered, and their occupants were thrown into the water. Other boats which were being let down came right on top of them, and it is believed that a number of lives were lost in this way. Some men who jumped into the sea from the liner's sloping deck were rescued in an exhausted condition, after remaining afloat for several hours.

Many of the soldiers who had put on life-belts, leaped overboard, and doubtless hundreds of others would have followed their example, when help came unexpectedly; a destroyer drew up along the starboard side of the Tuscania. Men leaped from the sides of the vessel and from the saloon deck to the deck of the destroyer, and it was not until several hundred were taken aboard—all she could carry—that she moved away, with her load of Americans. Then another British destroyer came out of the darkness into view on the port side of the sinking liner. This side was high out of the water, but ropes were available, and soon the men were sliding down the incline on hands and knees, guiding themselves by the ropes.

WHILE the work of rescue was going on, the American soldiers and the crew behaved admirably. There was not the slightest disorder.

Survivors give interesting accounts of the situation at this critical time. James Alton Turrington, a New Hampshire college student, said: "There was great difficulty in lowering our lifeboat, the chains being broken and the tackles entangled. Several boats capsized and the struggle in the water of the men thrown out added to the tragedy. I entered a boat with forty others, but it became filled with water and we had to jump out. I caught two oars which had been lashed together and held on. I was in the water for three hours before I was picked up."

First Lieutenant George Newton Hall of Los Angeles, an officer of the American Engineers, was sitting on a lounge reading when the torpedo struck. He shouted the word "torpedo!" and hurried to the lifeboat staff on the port deck. He said: "It was surprising to see how the new soldiers carried out their duties like veterans. We got the first boat down to the saloon deck, where it was promptly filled with soldiers, and was lowered into the water without mishap. The second boat, however, was being lowered when the wind carried it on to another lifeboat, crushing it and several of the occupants. We then launched three more without further trouble." Lieut. Hall followed by Lieut. Wallace Patterson of Cleveland slid down a rope into the last boat that was launched. It was loaded to the water line with 65 men. Turns were taken at the oars for three hours, when they were picked up by a trawler.

No one seems to have seen any indication of the torpedo, although the usual vigilant watch was kept. The signal had been given, however, from another vessel "Torpedo coming, Dodge!" But before anything could be done, the impact was felt. It is described as having been more like a crunching grinding forward movement, than a sudden, heavy blow. The Tuscania, notwithstanding her dangerous condition remained afloat for nearly two hours.

The first survivors were landed on the Irish coast at 4:30 A.M., on Wednesday, and for several hours thereafter patrol boats were busy picking up men who had managed to keep afloat. The largest number of survivors was landed at Buerana on the coast, near Belfast, where they filled the hospitals and several other buildings which were temporarily used as first-aid stations. Many of the women of the place voluntarily served as nurses and did excellent work, helping the doctors. Food, warm clothing and medical attention were promptly given. The Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. sent men and aid at once and the American army officials abroad took immediate steps to care for the men and to get them on their way again. The British Red Cross put its warehouses at the service of the Americans.

THE War Department on Friday was still without complete details. It was announced that among the units aboard the Tuscania were the Headquarters detachment and Companies D, C and F, of the 20th Engineers, the 107th Engineer train, 107th military police, 107th supply train, Aero Squadron Nos. 100, 158 and 213, replacement detachments Nos. 1 and 2 of the 32nd Division of National Guard troops, from Michigan and Wisconsin, and fifty-one officers unattached.

The Associated Press correspondent in Ireland wired on February 7, the following figures:

	Troops	Crew	Total
On board	2179	222	2401
Rescued	2030	205	2235
Bodies found	126		126
Missing	21	19	40

In one Irish port there were 91 American soldiers in the hospitals. Some of the survivors were landed on the Scottish coast.

Splendid discipline on board the Tuscania, both among the American troops and the crew, alone averted a much more serious disaster. The bodies of 44 of the American soldiers were washed up on the rocks on Thursday, February 7, fifteen miles away from the scene of the torpedoing. They will be buried with full military honors.

An American officer, who was one of the last men to leave the sinking Tuscania, states that a British destroyer, immediately after the launching of the torpedo, dashed in the direction of the assailant and dropped depth bombs, which resulted in the destruction of the submarine. If confirmed, this would be a remarkable illustration of quick retribution following the enemy attack.

This attack by a U-boat, under cover of darkness, is the first that has succeeded against an American transport. Such an attack had been foreseen. On January 27, Secretary Baker had announced that the War Department anticipated an intensified submarine campaign by Germany against our troopships; that Germany had extended her submarine zone to include the Azores, the Island of Madeira, and the Cape Verde Islands, and there were other evidences of a coming Teutonic effort to strike a blow at our fast increasing army in France.

The Tuscania was a fast passenger steamer of 14,000 tons, being 567 feet long, 66 feet 6 inches beam, and 45 feet deep. She was launched in 1914 and had until recently been in the transatlantic service carrying passengers and commercial freight.

The Year 1917 Among the Churches

Growth in Numbers, Union Movements, War Activities and Immense Contributions—Features of the Year

An Official Review by DR. H. K. CARROLL

THE distinctive features of the year 1917 among the Churches were: first, net gains in ministers, churches and members; second, strong union movements, particularly among Lutheran and Methodist bodies; third, great war activities; fourth, the raising of immense amounts of money for war and regular Church purposes.

I. As to the Union movements, three of the four Norwegian Lutheran synods have united in the formation of the Norwegian Lutheran Church of North America, constituting a body of 300,000 communicants, and reducing the number of different Lutheran organizations from twenty to eighteen. More important even than this happy consolidation is a pending union of three of the four larger bodies of Lutherans—the General Synod, the oldest, the General Council, and the United Synod South. In June, the General Synod unanimously adopted a new constitution for the proposed new body, and was followed with like unanimous action by the General Council in October, and the United Synod South in November. If the district synods of each approve, and several have already done so, the most notable union of the last half century will be consummated in November, 1918, bringing under one organization nearly a million Lutheran communicants. For the first time in history, all Lutheran bodies united last year in forming and conducting a Commission on War Activities.

Negotiations for the reunion of the Methodist Episcopal and Southern Methodist Episcopal Churches, which have been separate since 1845, are progressing slowly, several points in the plan having been decided favorably. Some of the most difficult ones, however, are yet to be settled, including the disposition to be made of the "Brother in Black." Union was proposed of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian Churches by the General Assembly of the former, and committees were appointed to consider the matter, the latter acceding out of courtesy. One small Reformed Presbyterian body has united with the Reformed Presbyterian General Synod. The long pending negotiations for the union of the United Brethren in Christ and the Methodist Protestant Church have been practically suspended.

War Activities

II. All the denominations, great and small, Protestant, Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Jewish, became intensely active in the appointment and support of commissions to minister to the social, moral, intellectual and religious needs of our soldiers and sailors, co-operating with the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, and similar organizations. Even non-resistant bodies like the Friends, the Mennonites, the Dunkards, took up relief of war-devastated countries, or like objects as their bit of work. Chaplains were furnished for the Army and Navy, and voluntary ministerial service was organized under denominational auspices for camps and cantonments, all working in harmony. Many millions were contributed for these and other purposes by the Churches, through denominational commissions and through the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A. and other organizations.

Very Large Contributions

III. The contributions of the Churches for various denominational purposes were not affected unfavorably by the heavy calls for extraordinary funds for the war; on the contrary, the giving of the Churches for their own regular work surpassed all previous years and set a new precedent. To the war funds they gave immense sums. The Jewish people raised over $5,000,000, the Roman Catholics $3,000,000, and other denominations large amounts. The Sunday-schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church collected over $118,000 for the Red Cross. For denominational lines of work, both special and regular, the Churches broke the record in their giving. The missionary cause, home and foreign, commanded larger sums than ever before. The Methodist Episcopal Church gave five and a half millions to its missions, an increase of more than a quarter of a million dollars. The Presbyterian Church (Northern) gave four and a quarter millions, an increase of half a million, and the Congregational Churches reached their highest point in giving for foreign missions. The Northern Presbyterian budget for various kinds of Church work reached a total of $31,000,000 and more, a net increase of over three millions. The Protestant Episcopal Church completed its ministerial pension fund at the end of February last, not only raising its proposed $5,000,000, but going beyond the goal by nearly three

REV. DR. CARROLL, who made the first complete Census of the Churches of America for the United States Government, is generally accepted as the leading authority on Church Statistics in this country. In this article he gives the record of what has probably been the most extraordinary year in modern Church history—a year of world-wide trial, from which the Church emerges stronger spiritually, numerically and in material resources. His presentation is one which should be read by pastors, church officials and members of all denominaand three-quarters millions. In addition, its regular contributions were $25,525,000, being an increase of more than $1,400,000 over the previous year. Campaigns in the Methodist Episcopal Church for educational funds resulted in about ten million dollars since May, 1916, or twenty-three millions in all, including amounts previously raised for that purpose. This Church has set itself the task of raising, in the next five years, $75,000,000 for its home and foreign missions, or at the rate of $15,000,000 a year. It has also raised a large amount for its ministerial pension funds.

Moderate Gains in Church Membership

IN some other respects the Churches have apparently not been quite so prosperous. The net increase of church members (573,315) is not large, either in comparison with the year 1916, or with the average of the last five years. It is not as small as in 1912—528,777—and in 1915—542,962—nor as large as in 1913—1,235,513—which was abnormal, following a very lean year.

In reckoning net increases, it must be kept in mind that church membership is constantly undergoing changes by losses and by gains. Some Churches keep a list of absent members, which grows from year to year. This list is not counted in the total of a few denominations. The number of deaths in one of the largest denominations last year was 44,375, or about one and one-tenth per cent. Taking one per cent. for application to the aggregate membership in 1916 of all religious bodies, we have a total probable loss by death of about 450,000. There must be, therefore, 450,000 accessions of new members to supply this depletion before any net increase can be figured. The losses by withdrawal, exclusion, etc., are usually much larger than the accessions by restoration; the losses by letter may be assumed to be almost offset by the gains by letter. Taking the various elements into consideration, it is probable that to show the net increase of 573,315 for 1917, the Churches had to take in a million and a quarter, more or less, of new members.

Church Growth a Natural Expectation

IN the United States, with an aggregate church membership of 40,515,126 in a population of, say, 103,000,000, at the end of 1916, nearly two-fifths are actual church members. But it must be remembered that infants and young children, also persons mentally incapable of choice, cannot, with a few exceptions, such as the Roman Catholic, the Eastern Orthodox, the Latter-Day Saints, qualify for church membership, and these classes are not included in the tabulations. The number of infants and children of nine years of age and under was, according to the United States Census of 1910, 20,391,996 in a total population of 92,000,000, or about 22 per cent. Some children of nine are treated as communicants, or members, how many the United States Census of 1916, shortly to appear, will show. Taking on this account, a lower percentage, say, twenty, as probably safe, we have as applied to the population at the end of 1916, estimated by the Government at nearly 103,000,000, 20,600,000 who cannot be considered as possible candidates for church membership, at least in 1917. This leaves, not considering idiots and insane, about 82,261,000 as possible church members, under the rule of the denominations generally. As there are, according to the returns for 1917, 40,515,126, it follows that the proportion of church members is a little less than one-half, or the number of church members in every thousand of persons qualified for choice as church members is about 493, which is by no means as bad as it is often represented, nor is it nearly as good as it ought to be.

Average Annual Increase

SOME careful observers hold that the fair expectation of net increase of the churches is at least two per cent. Two per cent. of the total of church members at the end of 1916, 39,941,811, would be 798,836. The actual net increase for 1917 was 573,315, which is less than two per cent. by 225,710, a difference that may perhaps be ascribed to war conditions.

It is only fair, perhaps, to mention the fact that many denominations, more than a hundred out of the 167, are either slowly declining, simply holding their own, or adding very slightly to their numbers. Then there are denominations which do not make returns annually, as the Methodist Protestant, the African Methodist Episcopal, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, and have not done so in the last two or three years, these alone aggregating nearly 1,390,000 members. Altogether the class of what may be called unproductive churches in 1917 was quite large, and serves to reduce the percentage of annual gains of the Churches which report every year. It is obvious that these must grow at a better rate than two per cent. to make good for the others.

The average net increase of the six years 1912-1917, inclusive, was 736,542, and for the twenty-five years 1890-1915, 750,496. The variations in the past five years have been very great. Thus, the net increase in 1912 was 528,777; in 1913 it jumped to 1,235,513, falling in 1914 to 782,007, and in 1915 to 542,962, to rise in 1916 to 756,867. The increase reported by the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1917 in all its fields is the largest of the present century, 154,225, exceeding that of 1916 by nearly 54,000 and that of 1910 by 109,000. Dr. Baketel, the statistician of the Church, informs me that he does not know to what the extraordinary increase of 1917 is due in particular. Evangelistic meetings were general and reception of members from other denominations were considerable; but beyond these features he does not mention any others.

Ministerial Gains and Losses

STRANGE to say, the columns of ministers and churches show great fluctuations from year to year. The Disciples of Christ, for example, reported for 1916 an apparent decrease of 769 churches, said to be due to the elimination of mere estimates. Doubtless the revision was too severe, as a gain of 428 is reported for 1917, which certainly is not normal. Similarly the changes in the number of ministers are unusual. In 1916 the denomination reported an increase of 386 ministers; for 1917 a loss of 367 is registered. This extraordinary fluctuation must be due in large part to errors in statistics.

The Roman Catholic gain in ministers is large and steady—411 in 1916 and 450 in 1917. The Methodist Episcopal Church, with the largest number of ministers of any Protestant denomination, seems to be steadily losing in this item. There was a net loss of 68 in 1915, of 50 in 1916, and of 27 in 1917. There were fewer Congregational ministers reported in 1916 by 337 than in 1915. There was a net loss last year of 24 Lutheran ministers, of 27 United Brethren preachers, and of enough by various other bodies to bring the total decreases up to 751 in seventeen denominations. No Presbyterian body reports any loss in this item.

The question of ministerial supply, with the alarming decrease of attendance at theological seminaries, is becoming a serious one in several of the denominations. Notwithstanding the losses, the net gains for the year are 1,244, which is 790 larger than in 1916.

Gains and Losses in Churches or Societies

TWENTY denominations report losses in churches aggregating 851, the Lutheran Synodical Conference being credited with a decrease of 212, the Iowa Synod with 145, and other Lutheran bodies with 15. This does not necessarily mean that 372 Lutheran churches have ceased to exist; but that many have changed their synodical relations, and that faulty statistics are responsible in part, for there was a net increase of 228 Lutheran churches in 1917. The Southern Baptist body appears to have suffered a net loss last year of 321 in the number of its churches.

Among other losses reported are 26 by the United Brethren in Christ, 26 by the Hungarian Reformed Church (due doubtless to the net loss of 4,500 members, many of whom probably returned to Hungary). Some of the losses of the United Brethren, the Evangelical Association, the United Evangelical Church and other bodies are probably the result of the tendency to abandon small, weak churches where they are not needed, and to merge or federate congregations which have not become, or have ceased to be, self-supporting, particularly in rural communities, with churches of other denominations, from motives of economy and efficiency.

The net gain in the item of churches, despite the losses by eighteen denominations, footing up 851, is

The Tuscania Sinking

THE sinking of the Tuscania, with the loss of 156 American soldiers and twenty-eight of her crew, is a painful incident in the great conflict in which we are now engaged. It will sadden many American homes; yet such events must be faced as to be expected among the ill-fortunes of war. Indeed, the wonder is not that a transport ship has been sunk at last, but that scores of our ships have ridden safely and landed a great army of our boys in Europe. The exception marks the rule, which is of efficient skill in sailing our troopships through enemy-infested seas.

The loss of even one American soldier is a poignant stab, not to his own kin alone but to every American, and the sudden death of seventy-three, without warning or chance of defense, is a blow that has thrilled and steeled the heart of the Nation to greater endurance and greater endeavor. These heroes, dying in duty, are destined to live a hundredfold in the stimulated energy and the increased activity of the Nation.

This disaster and these deaths bring home to us the truth that more important than life is the purpose one lives for, and more crucial than death is the manner of dying. These 2,200 young Americans faced death with patriotic song. The cause to which they had devoted and were giving up their lives was sufficient to hold their spirits exalted unto the end. Their courage and devotion furnish to all our soldiers and sailors and to all the rest of us an impulse and example that will not be lost.

Every great cause has its heavy cost. We must steel ourselves and never shrink. No race and no generation can have liberty, or be worthy of it, which will not pay the price.

Remembering the Suffering

TO the severe rigors of the times are added those of the coldest winter known in many years. Transportation has been disarranged and business disorganized to a degree never before experienced by the present generation; but, more deplorable still, the poor have been brought to a condition of privation and suffering all but beyond bearing.

The delay of shipping, costly as it is, can be withstood, and the loss of business can be survived. These things loom large in our eyes just now, but, after all, in the long run they matter less than the suffering of the thousands who are cold and hungry. The big worldly affairs will be readjusted and cared for, never fear. That seems to be the world's chief concern. But the spiritual needs of the world are not so widely championed. "The poor that cry and have none to help them" present the world's oldest problem and its gravest. It is a spiritual more than a material one, for to meet it we must give of ourselves even more than of our means, and as we do unto these we do unto Him.

In the large cities the charity organizations may be able to care for most cases of extreme want. The supply of means is generous. But in the smaller places and in country districts, where systematic helpfulness is not far advanced, there is much suffering that can be reached only by direct individual endeavor. Here there devolves upon every Christian man and woman a sacred duty—and yet in the light of the divine teachings and promises it is less a duty than a privilege.

How do the poor keep from freezing in the cold? How do they get food at prices so high? These are questions to which every real man will find the answer for himself. He whose heart leads him in the quest will soon know, and the answer will be in his own hands.

The Abandoned Baby

COULD it be believed that a baby abandoned on a doorstep, in an arcaway, on the street, or elsewhere, has a better chance of surviving the ills of childhood and reaching maturity than the average baby cared for by its own mother?

One would not think it possible that a child turned adrift at birth, left out in the cold and wet, would have, physically, a better prospect of life than the average baby in its mother's arms.

But it is the fact. It is strange, but true.

Figures furnished by the New York Association for the Improvement of the Poor show that in that city only 11 per cent. of abandoned children die under the age of two, while 13 per cent. of all the children born in the city die under that age.

Why do the children abandoned on a doorstep fare better on the average than those that have their mother's care?

Because the founding is kept in a room where it has sufficient fresh air.

Because it is kept reasonably and evenly warm in winter and cool in summer.

Because it is fed sufficiently, scientifically and, above all, regularly.

These are the simple reasons assigned for the fact that the child which would seem to have the least chance of growing up healthfully really has the best chance.

It is an antique stock joke that none know so much about raising babies as old maids. Well, the fact is that a corps of unmarried women, especially trained, are teaching the mothers of New York how to feed and otherwise care for their babies, and are thus turning thousands of sickly and fretful infants into healthy and happy ones.

Mother-love is the strongest passion known to humanity; and yet there is striking commentary upon the beautiful development of brotherly love in the fact that a philanthropic institution can and does better for a child than the average mother can.

The Inner Progress

*"How small, of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure!"*

FORTY years ago, two brothers came from Ireland to an American city with barely enough money to keep them over the first night. Mike went to work in the city at a dollar and a half a day, and is working for about that still. Pat pushed on out into the country and found a job at $15 a month with board. In the course of time Pat bought 100 acres of land and with his own hands and the willing help of his neighbors built house, barn and fences. He has raised eight sons and daughters, four of whom have gone through college. He is a prosperous, serene, progressive citizen.

Every community has its even more sharply contrasting types. There is the man satisfied with his material progress, but dead to the demands of the spirit; and there is that higher type of man, with whom wealth, education and standing are only means to a nobler cause, the opening of the minds of all the divine truths, the bringing of all into brotherhood, the uplifting of all.

In this fair land of ours are millions of like instances, showing that back of all general conditions there lie individual qualities that determine success and failure. Let us never forget that true progress is in the individual's own heart and hands.

Fifty Million Church Members

IT is a mighty showing of numerical strength which the combined forces of the 167 religious denominations of America present in the comprehensive review which we publish in another part of this issue. Dr. Carroll, who is the recognized authority on church statistics, points out, however, that the increase is not shared by all the denominations equally, but that a number of the bodies that have a large foreign-speaking element have had a "lean year," due doubtless to the war. This was to have been anticipated. At the same time, the great denominational groups have all made substantial gains in membership and in material resources, besides adding somewhat to the number of ministers and church buildings.

What spiritual progress has been made during the year cannot be indicated in statistics, no matter how gratifying the increase in membership. Yet, in a year of such tremendous upheaval, and marked by so much of sorrow and suffering, it is worth noting that the denominations have been drawing closer together than ever before, on lines of harmonious cooperation in Christian work. This and the further fact that all the great denominations are now vying with each other in spiritual efforts, in behalf of our soldiers and sailors, may indicate a stronger tendency toward breaking down the old barriers than can now be estimated. Another cheering sign is the very generous provision made for carrying forward the work of both home and foreign missions, which has been done on a scale that surpasses all previous records.

Still there remains the fact that the number of the bodies continues without apparent diminution year after year. The old boundaries may be getting attenuated, but they are still there. What a glorious army Protestant America would have to carry forward the banner of Christ and his Gospel, were these 25,000,000 Protestants to become one united force with that end in view! May the day soon come when they will no longer be rival factions, but all as one flock with one Shepherd.

Look for the Bright Things

ONE has said that laughter was the effect of original sin and that Adam could not laugh before the fall. Such a gloomy theologian never appreciated the poetical thought in nature when the trees of the field clap their hands for joy; never heard the music of the singing of birds and brooks nor breathed the fragrance of smiling flowers and blossoms. David's Psalms are full of singing and praising God because joy had been put into his heart and gladness into his soul. Our Lord said, "Be of good cheer; in the world ye shall have tribulation, but in me, fullness of joy." Therefore, pain and pleasure may be in the heart at the same moment. There are first tears in the cloud before the painting of the beautiful rainbow.

Is not the cheerful, smiling disposition an outward sign of inward pleasure? As the bee sucks honey out of wornwood, so the soul finds sweetness out of the bitter Marahs of life. The most melancholy minds, like that of the poet Cowper, have been the most humorous.

Cheerfulness rises from hearts of deep pathos, of rich sensibilities and quiet gentleness. It is more than the vigor of mere physical health; it is a kindly condition of soul purified in harmony with the Christ. He was not solemn and sour, like some saints, but full of joy, bright with blessedness, winsome to old and young. Such a heart is always thinking of others rather than of himself, everywhere scattering sunshine, while the gloomy are examining themselves and exhibiting their unhappy condition to every one they meet.

"A merry heart doeth good like a medicine," and a cheerful physician inspires hope in his patient which is better than drugs. A smiling parent illuminates the home as a bright Christian fills society with hopefulness.

Is there not a bright side to the world's sorrow? Tears of love and of sadness flow mingled down our faces; unexampled benevolence for a score of noble causes is culturing character, making men more like Christ, uniting suffering nationalities into brotherhoods of kindly sympathy. The faces of warriors are turned heavenward, away from the luxury of wealth and ease, in their giving self for the preservation of the principles of righteousness.

When Handel's Messiah, in 1780, was first given in London, it is said that the audience was so deeply affected by the music in general that, when the chorus began, "For the Lord God omnipotent reigneth," all started to their feet, not excepting the king, and remained standing till it was ended. May not the whole world become equally thrilled when peace prevails and when all can sing, "God reigns and the governments of the nations still live"?

A Book for the Times

IT is astonishing to find how many people are interested in the study of prophecy at the present time; yet in view of the great events now taking place, it is perhaps the most natural thing in the world. To Bible students especially, there is a strong, compelling attraction in prophecy that is not to be denied. And any book or publication that can shed light on the deep and mysterious utterances of the old prophets is sure of a welcome.

So many letters have been received from readers of the Christian Herald making inquiry concerning the old book on prophecy mentioned in these columns several weeks ago, as having been issued in 1886 by Rev. Michael Baxter, that we have decided, in order to satisfy all who are interested in his interpretations of Daniel and Revelation, to publish a new edition of the book in question. It is now on the press and will be ready in a week or two at most. As a limited edition of "Forty Prophetic Wonders" will be issued, we would suggest that those who desire copies should send in their names and addresses to us as soon as possible, and copies will be reserved for them.

Everyone who is interested in the great prophecies should possess this volume. There are many books issued on prophecy nowadays, but we know of none that has a greater interest for the student who approaches the subject with an open mind, and a desire to know what the great interpreters of prophecy have written concerning the fulfilment of the fore-shadowings in Daniel and Revelation.

Selling Hardware in War Times Is a Matter of Resourcefulness. Mr. Bob Returns from a Trip on the Road and Explains Why Business Was Good.

"A POUND OF NAILS IS A POUND OF NAILS"

Nine business men, upon whose faces the cares and anxieties of War were written indelibly, were actually smiling again.

"But how did you manage it?" demanded the stout gentleman who was crumpling up oyster crackers in nervous fingers.

For Mr. Bob had returned from two months on the road with a remarkable record. He had beaten his last year's record for hardware sales—this in the face of war and its uncertainties. The amount of building had decreased. There was less reason for hardware. But Mr. Bob's order slips clinched his statement. It was there in black and white. He had put it over.

Mr. Bob had been toasted and dined. The dinner in his honor had been embarrassingly picturesque. Now coffee in the cups grew cold. A waiter, suddenly interested, turned his back to the private dining-room door and listened intently. Mr. Bob was telling them: "Anybody can sell goods in prosperous times," said he. "It's when things are going slow that real salesmanship comes out. That was the doctrine I preached on this trip."

"For example: When I reached a little town in the

farming belt where the war was beginning to eat into people's consciousness, I found my big man there—Drake—scared to death. He wouldn't even think of putting in a new line of hammers and saws, although his stock was about gone. It was the same with other goods; 'conservatism' he called it. I called it just plain business suicide. I happened to know that about twenty blocks were going up in that county in factory buildings—special government contracts. The work was of a certain kind—quick, nervously active. We had premeditated a hammer and a saw for just such work. I told him about them. I told him how five hundred carpenters, from all over the country, had put aside pet prejudice for old tools, and used the wider-nosed hammer on the battery of buildings in Washington that were put up so speedily that a movie camera got the entire operation from first to last.

"That changed Drake. He saw the light. It brought confidence back again. I sold a handsome order—more than usual. And Drake will get rid of every bit of it. Before I start on a trip I stake off my towns with information. If a factory is going up, I make it very much my business to get wind of it."

"Which reminds me. I have passed that knowledge on to every hardware dealer on my books: Keep posted on building plans a year ahead. Don't be content with what your local contractor or architect tells you; reach over his head and out into the places where financiers are planning million-dollar operations. Many times the people at Washington will supply this information—if you ask them. Just now, the decrease in home-building is somewhat offset by even bigger things. When an army cantonment goes up, they may bring carload lots of material to erect those giant cities, but there are enough extras to bring prosperity to the local hardware man—yes, the retail fellow."

No use comin' around this year

"I tell my trade to see the constructive things that war is bringing. They have been too inclined to look at the destructive side. 'Building is gone to pieces' is the cry. Not at all. In one Carolina district there has been more building during the past six months and more planned for the next six months than the same section ever knew before. Homes? Bungalows? No. Improvements on farms and on factories to take care of new lines and urgent Food Administration requirements!

"I talked with Jimmy Melrose. Jimmy is sixty and has a five-story hardware store that is the pride of the county. 'No use you comin' around this year,' he said to me. 'No building—no building. Contractors and architects in this state are hiring out by the day on farms as milkers of prize Holsteins. Trot right along, sonny.'

"I rented a Ford and took Jimmy out for a fifty-mile buzz. He had been living too close to his business and his own counter. Ground was even then being broken for three new dairies not two miles away. There were thirty silos going up. A big rubber house was arranging to build a branch on the outskirts of the town to handle government orders. Every farm bristled with spring housecleaning. Because Jimmy had seen no homes being built he thought building had stopped."

"There is another hint I've given many a dealer—get away from the store once in a while. Drive through the country. Look up business and business optimism. Don't wait for it to come into the store."

"I proved another thing to Jimmy that interested and frightened him. He wasn't getting the business he should from his own section. The mail-order catalogue got some of it. A live Jimmy might have forestalled this."

"Major Anderson, of Wallack Hill, belongs to what I term the 'counter dealer' class. He opens up at seven and closes at nine. He contends that people will come to him if they want anything. If they don't, they won't. And that's bad! bad! I had a long talk with the Major about two weeks ago. He was 'cutting down.' He had let some of his help go."

"I went down into the basement with him and he showed me two rooms filled with fine ranges. They were beginning to rust. 'Nobody will buy a range these times,' he explained."

"What have you done to sell these ranges, Major?" I demanded.

"Oh, I run an electro in our local paper every two weeks, but it's no use."

"I stayed there for five days. I made the Major use quarter-pages in the Democrat and the Times-Clarion. I helped him write the ads. We reproduced some of Mr. Hoover's food cards in small size and used up a liberal share of the space explaining how necessary it was to conserve. Never before did a kitchen mean more to a nation than right now. It was really patriotic to have an efficient kitchen. And the life and heart and gizzard of a kitchen is the range. As a matter of fact, the housewives of Wallack Hill had not changed ranges in generations. Their cooking facilities were inadequate. Food and fuel were being wasted. Our advertising copy put it squarely up to the women to look upon this range thing with pride as well as patriotism. There would be more bread-baking than ever soon—a new kind of bread-baking—a more difficult kind. More jelly and jam would be put up than ever before—more foods put away on the shelves for a rainy day. If ever a perfect range was needed it was then—now. It meant turning the kitchen into an ideal workshop. Were farmers in that territory using horses for field work? No; tractors. Well, there was just as much difference between an old worn-out range of fifteen years back and a modern range, as there was between a horse and a tractor. The Major was sure selling ranges when I left."

"This is the prime hour for a carpenter to replenish his tool-box. Funny thing, but the average carpenter will fuss along with worn-out stuff until he is driven to make a purchase. This is due, in part, to sentiment. These have an attachment for a saw or a hammer or a bit that approaches superstition. I have started many dealers this season to stimulating the sale of tools to carpenters. Prices are apt to go up. Metals—good metals—are getting very scarce. As soon as this war rumpus is over, there will be a grand rush to work in the building field. There is apt to be a shortage of superior tools. It is a man's duty to stock up while there's a chance. Little hundred-word sermons, with a good electro, telling the story, are selling the goods."

"A pound of nails is a pound of nails in the hardware business. Pretty nearly everything in a hardware store is a necessity—an economic necessity—not a luxury. The line can be sold, but war has made it necessary to find fresh appeals."

"Take paint. It isn't economy not to use paint. It's the most stupid sort of false economy. But people seldom stop to look at it in that way. 'We'll not repaint the house this year; we'll just wait and see what happens,' is the remark you hear. But if you take Mr. Houseowner aside—to the back of the store—and show him what happens to wood when another winter gets digging at it, he is apt to reconsider. When wood needs white lead, or floors need varnish, or shingles restraining, it's an urgent need. You might as well say to a man who is sick: 'Oh, the times are hard; we'll give you medicine next season.'

"This is a period of 'reason why' salesmanship. A dealer must be more than a machine behind a counter."

"A hardware dealer in a fairly large town on my books sold three thousand pocket-knives in three weeks. That was more than he would ordinarily sell in a year. A piece of white cardboard in a window and two cents' worth of lampblack did the trick. Here was an ideal gift to the soldier boy. The sign went on to tell that it was a lasting token—a practical one. The knives had name-plates for special engraving. It needed only a hint to begin the knife drive. They went like hot cakes. Nobody had thought of it before. Mothers and fathers and sisters bought those knives for the boys."

"Sometimes small and apparently silly ideas will stimulate trade. I saw a two-week campaign almost sell out one man's stock of building tools. The women folks were told that if they wanted to make practical gifts, the kind that counted and that meant genuine constructive help, they would buy birthday gifts of fine-tempered tools. Men needed saws and hammers and planes and the like. More and more odd jobs would be done by fathers and brothers at home, as an economical measure. Someone has a birthday every day in the week and every week in the year. Birthdays are a sure market. And fine building-tools are indispensable. A daily advertisement on these lines sold the goods."

"One popular hardware man sent letters to practically every houseowner in town."

One paragraph of this form letter read as follows: 'We are sending an experienced locksmith to your house. There have been broken knobs, lost keys, worn-out fixtures, loose hinges, tarnished parts that detract from the looks of your home and from its financial valuation. Permit our man to give a report on these important matters. It may mean a real saving; it may mean blocking a burglar. The service is free.'

"That burglar touch was a shrewd masterpiece. In set folks thinking—wondering. Hardware was sold in tremendous volume. Two hundred new locks and even the fancy equipment in a little over a week."

"Constructive salesmanship is the kind the hardware man is doing, must do, more and more. In reality, it is insidiously making people do things they should do, in any event. The practice is ethically correct and valid. I have tried to make my folks out in the small towns look upon their own hardware stores as islands of safety for the community. You can do without a new fur coat or a diamond ring or fancy steaks, but you are robbing yourself when you let a barn door dangle on a broken hinge, or lose fifty prime white leghorns because the hen-house was built ten years ago and should be replaced by a new one that is impervious to mice, weasels and vermin. A hardware store, in war times of all times, is a center of constructive progress. It is a shop of building for the future and solidifying the past. I have sold goods in the face of pessimism. But it's simple—it's only common sense, salted and peppered, with a dash of paprika stirred in."

The stout gentleman at the end of the table crunched his last oyster cracker.

"Mister Bob," said he, "you actually make me want to go out into some small town and start a hardware store."

Tools become popular birthday gifts

Old ranges came under suspicion

The Redemption of Jerusalem

A SERMON BY REV. D. J. BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT—Psalm 122: 6. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee."

AT the time of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan the approach was from the east. The formidable hosts of Israel, thoroughly organized and mobilized during the forty years in the wilderness, came up along the asphalt plains of the Dead Sea, crossed the lower fords of the Jordan, entered the narrow pass of Jericho and so approached the site of Jerusalem, which was then crowned by a mighty fortress of the Jebusites. But they were unable to reduce it. Four hundred years it stood as an impregnable menace to their peace. Then it was taken by David, who introduced the Ark of the Covenant and thus made Jerusalem not merely the capital city of Israel but the universal center of the worship of the true God.

It was five hundred years after this that Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem and, having destroyed it by fire, carried away its people into an apparently hopeless captivity. By the rivers of Babylon they sat down and wept; they hung their harps upon the willows and wept when they remembered Zion. Keeping their windows open toward their ancient city they mourned, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I count thee not above my chiefest joy!" In course of time the captives were permitted to return; the city arose from its ashes to a new career of prosperity, but only to await calamities further on.

THE next of the memorable sieges was in 70 A. D. when Titus came up with his Tenth Legion and great body of mercenaries and wound them around a doomed city as with the coils of a mighty serpent. The events which followed have scarcely a parallel in history. The people held out until reduced to the last extremity by famine and pestilence. In their desperation they fought for the reptiles which crawled beneath the walls. The dead lay unburied in the streets. The gates were forced at length, and the garrison was driven back into the Castle of Antonia. A burning brand was thrown on the Temple and it was enveloped in flames. The golden eagles gleamed in the light of the conflagration and the standard of the Roman Empire was lifted above the Lion of the Tribe of Judah. All was over.

It is recorded that no less than eleven hundred thousand perished during this campaign, while ninety-seven thousand of the survivors were carried away into exile. The ruins were plowed over and sown with salt. On the Arch of Titus, which stands in the Roman Forum as a memorial of this victory, may be seen the long procession of captives; mothers with little children at their skirts, wounded soldiers tearing at their bandages, priests and rabbis with faces fallen upon their breasts; and above them all the golden candlestick with its lights gone out.

In the year 637 Jerusalem was again besieged by the Caliph Omar and a multitudinous army of Moslems. The feeble resistance of its inhabitants was easily overcome; and the flag of the false prophet floated from Mount Zion. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre was supplanted by the Mosque of Omar, from whose minarets for five centuries the call of the muezzin was heard, "Allah ill Allah! To prayer! To prayer! There is one God and Mohammed is his prophet!"

The Moslem spell was broken in 1099, when the Crusaders under Godfrey of Bouillon laid siege to Jerusalem and delivered it from the infidels' hands. A century later it was retaken by Saladin the Great and has continued under Moslem rule until this day.

THE Jerusalem of our time is a sordid place of about 25,000 inhabitants. The populous and formidable city of the olden time now lies buried a hundred feet below the surface of the earth. In the logic of passing events the mysterious prophet who was once heard proclaiming, "A voice from the East, a voice from the West, a voice from the four winds of heaven against Jerusalem and her people, because they have offended against God," is heard again; and again "Melchizedek, the King of Salem" lifts his hands in benediction saying, "Blessed be Abraham and the God of Abraham who hath not forgotten to be gracious unto him!" Can it be that the time is drawing nigh when Jerusalem shall shake herself from the dust, put on her beautiful garments and enter into her own?

In the vicissitudes of her history along the centuries we observe a singular vindication of God's truth. For these events are predicted in prophecy, in minutest detail and particular; the successive sieges, famines and pestilences, the raising of mounds and digging of trenches, the overthrow of her altars and scattering of the bones of her sacred dead, the destruction of her Temple so utterly that "not one stone shall be left upon another," the leading away of successive deportations of captives, the plowing of her ruins and their sowing with salt—all are recorded in prophecy. Thus it is written and thus it must be; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

When Napoleon was asked by an infidel friend if he could produce one notable evidence of the truth of the Scriptures in which he professed to believe, he answered, "Yes; the Jews."

HERE is also a striking vindication of God's justice. Be not deceived, God is not mocked: whatsoever a nation soweth, that shall it also reap.

The Lord is said to have "risen up early" to warn his chosen people of the perils awaiting them. He "sent his prophets" to admonish them, saying, "Why should ye be stricken any more? The whole head is sick and the whole heart is faint: Your country is desolate, is overthrown by strangers: and ye are left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a besieged city. Wherefore, put away the evil of your doings before mine eyes: cease to do evil, learn to do well. If ye be obedient ye shall eat of the good of the land; but if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured with the sword, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it!"

The Jews were called "the chosen people" because they were made the depositary of a singular trust; namely, the preservation and transmission of the Messianic hope. But they were recreant to that trust. When their Messiah came they crucified him, saying, "His blood be upon us and upon our children after us!" All subsequent history is in evidence to show that God has taken them at their word. They have been given over to judicial blindness. Every civilized nation on earth has accepted Jesus as the Messiah except the Jews. It was written of them, "The Lord shall smite you with blindness so that ye shall grope at noonday, as blind men feeling their way along the wall."

I was once present in a synagogue in Rotterdam where the services greatly perplexed me. The place was thronged with worshippers. There were no lights except a candle here and there which merely served to make the darkness visible. The high priest was chanting a misereere that enveloped the congregation in indescribable gloom. What could it mean? Then suddenly the service changed. The great chandeliers were kindled and tapers were lighted everywhere and waved aloft. Priest and people joined in a triumphant song, in which I could distinguish but one word, "Hosanna, Hosanna!" On inquiry I learned that this was the anniversary of the downfall of Jerusalem and the captivity of the Jews. "But what," I inquired, "was the meaning of the sudden light and the Hosannas?" My Jewish informant said, "This was the celebration of the Hope of Israel." Thus after nineteen centuries are they still groping, like blind men along the wall. When will the hoodwink be taken from their eyes?

IN the connection of current events with the past history of Jerusalem we observe, furthermore, a complete vindication of God's faithfulness. There are two salient facts concerning which the Oracles are clear: namely, the Dispersion and the Restoration.

As to the former there is no room for any difference of opinion. The oldest flag in the world is that of the Jews: two blue stripes on a white ground, with a double triangle as the symbol of unity. This is claimed to be the very standard that led the armies of Joshua when they advanced to the conquest of Canaan. Yet the Jews are the only nation on earth without a country, and of unity they have none. There are 400,000 of them in the Russian army, 250,000 in the German, 50,000 in the American and as many more in the armies of England and her allies. By this it appears that the Jews are not only fighting against each other, but fighting for every people but their own.

Their strange preservation as a "peculiar people" is another fact which can only be interpreted in the light of a special providence. Through all the vicissitudes of the weary centuries they have kept their distinctive character, their very cast of countenance, their commercial instincts and habits of life. They have come down through history like the Gulf Stream that, rising in the South Atlantic, courses northward until it empties into the Arctic Sea, all the while flowing between banks of cold water yet keeping itself apart, a volume a thousand times larger than the Amazon and of swifter current, bearing with it the genial influences of the Orient to temper the sterner climates of the North. So have this people been preserved through the centuries, scattered among all nations yet mingling their blood with none, true to their monotheistic traditions, even while rejecting their Messiah, and inadvertently contributing to the ultimate conquest of the Gospel by their loyalty to the worship of the one true God.

Is there no divine Purpose in this? If prophecy is clear as to the Dispersion, shall it be equally clear as to the Restoration? Multitudes of "Zionists" are hoping for it. Two-thirds of the land are said to be owned by the estate of Sir Moses Montefiore. This, however, is really a matter of slight moment. To restrict the splendid prospects of the Restoration to the narrow horizons of an insignificant province in a remote corner of the earth is to take a singularly meager view of the destiny that awaits this wonderful people. In any event there will surely be a spiritual Restoration; a coming to their right mind; an opening of their blind eyes. This was predicted by their own rejected Messiah when on his last visit to the Holy City he lamented its calamities, saying, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem; how often I would have gathered you, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not; and now behold, your house is left unto you desolate!" Then followed these significant words: "Ye shall see me no more until ye shall say, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!'"

IF this meant anything it meant that these people were to confess in the fulness of time, that Jesus of Nazareth whom they crucified was the long-looked-for Messiah, the veritable Christ of God. Never will the glory be restored to Israel until they fall in with the triumphal procession that has come down the centuries, waving palms and casting garments before him with the cry, "Hosanna, hosanna to the Son of David!" Never until they are prepared to crown him Lord of all.

In view of these considerations it behooves us as Christians to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem," for the peace that can only be found in a full and joyous recognition of the Prince of Peace. Let us look with confidence for the home-bringing of the chosen people; for so it is written, "I will give unto her the valley of Achor for a door of hope; and she shall sing as in the days of her youth. In that day they shall call me no more Baali, 'my lord,' but Ishi, 'my husband'; for I will betroth them unto me in faithfulness and they shall know me."

Let us pray for ourselves, also, that our ears may not be dulled to the lessons of the past nor our eyes blind at noonday. "O foolish Galatians," said Paul, "who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been set forth, crucified among you?" If the Galatians of nineteen hundred years ago were blameworthy, what shall be said of those who walk in darkness now?

And let us pray for our country. We are a Christian nation, founded by Christian forefathers on the principles set forth in the Gospel of Christ. The sign of the Cross is over us. We are bound by a Covenant as really as Israel was; and woe betide us if we ignore it. The pathway of history is lined with the ruins of nations that have proven recreant to truth and the precepts of the Moral Law. It is for us to say whether or no we shall suffer a similar fate, or by our faithful devotion to the God of our fathers be preserved until the dawning of the millennial day.

FINALLY let us lift up holy hands with our hearts in prayer for the world, this sin-cursed, war-stricken old world of ours. Heavy are the chastenings now falling upon it; but herein is the testing of our faith. The Spirit that brooded over chaos will yet bring order out of confusion. Above the roar and tumult of the Great Powers, behold the mountains full of the Lord's horses and chariots. The dust-clouds that gathered about the Turks who garrisoned the Ancient City and the Allied Armies who advanced to its overthrow shall not prevent the open vision of John the Divine: "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day and I saw the Holy City, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven prepared as a bride adorned for her husband; and I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, 'Behold the tabernacle of God is with men; and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God!'"

Visiting the Great Yesterdays

SUNDAY, February 24. Deut. 4:32. "Ask now of the days that are past." Yes, but what shall we ask about, and what kind of spoil shall we bring back from the treasures of the past? What have we in our purses or in our wallets when we return? In the life of Lord John Russell I came upon a phrase which set me enquiring about my own habits. In a speech which he made in the House of Commons he said, "We talk too much, I think a great deal too much, of the wisdom of our ancestors. I wish we could imbibe the courage of our ancestors."

It is a very suggestive word and one which may justly lead us to overhaul our ways. For it too often happens that when we go seeking for the wisdom of the past we bring back its prudence and reluctance. We go for counsel and we return with caution. We seek advice on our own new outlook and then we stand in the "good old ways." Now suppose we take Lord John Russell's suggestion, and visit our ancestors in order that we may imbibe their courage, what sort of courage should we bring back to the new demands of our own time?

Well, first of all, I think we should have courage to make new trails over untrodden country. That was one of their most shining characteristics. They were not afraid to break new ground. They would even obey the grip of a dumb imperative, not seeing the distant scene. They went forth, "not knowing whither they went." They were not afraid to take risks with God. They were not afraid to be pioneers into more scrupulous rectitude and larger freedom. They marched on, with trumpets blowing, over the roadless moors, trusting to the guidance of the Lord they served. And we, too, are face to face with untraversed country. We have new ground to break. The wilderness is before us, but we think we hear the call of the garden in the very realm of the desert! Shall we venture? Let us imbibe the courage of our ancestors and dare to leave their ways behind as they left the ways of those who had gone before.

If we drink the valor of our ancestors we shall have courage to stand by the Truth even when the crowd has gone another way. We can go to the past and talk with Mr. Worldly-Wiseman, or we can have fellowship with Mr. Valiant-for-the-Truth. Mr. Worldly-Wiseman is always in favor of safe measures, and he would go with the majority in the hope of something turning up, "you never know what!" His offered "wisdom" is always small prudence and compromise. But we need the courage of our great ancestors, courage to march with Truth in little companies, courage to "rejoice with the truth," in the absolute assurance that, in spite of all appearances, she marches to inevitable triumph. It is the courage which believes that Truth is God's heaven of the kingdom and therefore indestructible.

And we must imbibe the courage that sees the Captain, and is comparatively careless about everything else. Where is the Lord Jesus Christ in this business? There! Then forward into hardships, forward into light!

A Business Man's Faith

MONDAY, February 25. Luke 5:27, 28. "And he went forth and saw a publican named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom; and he said unto him, Follow me. And he left all, rose up, and followed him." This was a turning-point in the life of Levi. Our moments of decision determine our character and our destiny. Here was a quiet man, a business man, methodical and undemonstrative. He heard the simple sentence, "Follow me," and immediately, "without a word, rose up and followed" Christ. What lay back of this choice? Doubtless a previous knowledge of Jesus, and, deeply reposing in Levi's own heart, a conscious need, a yearning, for a more abundant life.

As we read these words anew, we perceive Levi's "reaction" to the appeal of Christ, manifesting itself in renunciation, a break with old ideas. "He left all." Then, the vitality of the impression Jesus had made upon Levi's mind expresses itself in action. He "rose up." The sincerity of Levi's surrender to the new ideal is revealed by his dedication. He "followed him." Levi was first a disciple, and then an apostle. He entered the school of Christ for training. That was the day of his matriculation.

The verse which follows these words indicates how deep and real was the work of grace in this revenue official's life. He went to work as a Christian should. He "made a great feast in his own house." He wanted to make Jesus known to as many of his friends and neighbors as possible. He invited his former associates, publicans, and others, to meet the Master. The first impulse of the sincerely converted man is to spread the good news. No one is thoroughly saved who is content to be saved alone.

Keeping the Lord Before Us

TUESDAY, February 26. Ps. 16:8. "I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved." Expounders of Scripture have been perplexed by the bold assertion which David makes in this text. They have declared it to be more than any human being can do, viz., to be always thinking of the Lord amid the multifarious duties and the distracting cares of this life. It is true that no man is so entirely consecrated to God as to be always consciously in touch with him. Hence the frequent warnings in Scripture, not to forget God.

But the text becomes perfectly clear when it is referred to Christ. In his sermon on the day of Pentecost Peter declares that David spoke these words of Jesus. In him there was an unbroken intercourse with God, so that he could declare to Nicodemus that he was in heaven, although at that moment he was conversing with the teacher of the Jews. Jesus kept the Lord before him, not only in the many hours which he spent in prayer, but also in his daily activities. He was certain that in his whole life there had not been a single step that was not taken in accordance with the will of his Father. When he declared that he had come upon earth to do what the Father had commanded him, he meant that not only the prominent acts of his life were performed in obedience to the Father, but all that he did or refused to do was so performed. He had placed himself absolutely under God, so that every preference which suggested itself to him at any time was yielded by him to the superior will of the Father. "Not my will, but thine, be done." His obedience was perfect and constant till the end, and he could truthfully declare his task finished when he expired.

This complete surrender to God filled Jesus with the assurance that God was on his side, and gave him the firmness of conviction and the courage that characterizes his public activity. This is the life that every man should live. When God demands that we should love him with all our heart, and all our soul and all our mind, he demands that we have him always before us. The life of Jesus—his whole life—is our ransom; it makes restoration for every default of ours. Next, it is our pattern; we are to have Jesus always before us, if we wish to please God.

The Free Will

WEDNESDAY, February 27. Ps. 106:15. "He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul." Israel lusted after flesh food rather than the manna, just as people today lust after the evils of the flesh. The body may grow soft and fat and luxuriant while the soul becomes thin with spiritual barrenness. Daniel practiced self-denial, refusing the king's meat, while his soul fed on the richest heavenly manna. How many choose the riches of silver even if they lose the golden glory of character.

God will not break down the wall of the will. He wants no machine goodness. When he sees a man determined on an evil course, rejecting all warnings and pleadings, he gives him over to reprobate mind. The striving of the divine Spirit ceases because the heart is hardened. After such people grow rich and prosperous they are often deluded into thinking that God is on their side, because he has granted their request to increase in riches. They were, however, simply let alone, permitted to enter into temptation without hindrance, left free to do wrong, without the accusations of conscience or the gnawings of remorse.

What a blessed transformation when the covetous lover of wealth seeing the golden millstone sinking him into the depths of the dark waters, asserts his will power, surrenders his riches, crying out, "I come to do thy will, O God! I will make it my meat and drink, my all in all!"

Whose Shepherds Are We?

THURSDAY, February 28. John 21:15. "Jesus saith to Peter. Feed my lambs." Peter Carter, a Christian business man of the last generation, used to teach a class of colored children in a mission school in New York. It is related that one day a stranger visited the school and was invited to address the children. He spoke about the Twenty-third Psalm and the beautiful relationship between the Oriental shepherd and his flock. He reminded them of One who called himself the Good Shepherd, and who said he knew his flock by name. He emphasized the tenderness and strength of the Good Shepherd. Closing his address he said, "Now, children, do you know who the Good Shepherd is?" Instantly many of the children cried out, "Oh, yes, we know—he is Mr. Peter Carter, he is the good shepherd." Mr. Carter was embarrassed, as well he might have been. The speaker, too, felt that the children had missed the point of his illustration. But what a tribute it was to the shepherdly heart and habits of Mr. Carter!

The apostle to whom Jesus spoke these words had failed and fallen in loyalty to his Lord, but he was penitent and the Master pardoned his lapse and took him again into fellowship with himself, sealing the backslider's acceptance with a high and holy commission, "Feed my lambs."

Winning Through Faith

FRIDAY, March 1. I John 4:4. "Greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world." David goes to meet Goliath in single combat. What a contrast! A giant pitted against a dwarf; a trained man of war facing a shepherd boy; a huge spear and a powerful broadsword plying against a sling and a few pebbles. This is not an even contest; it is too contemptible; the big husky warrior laughs and scoffs to fight. But in taking the measure of his opponent he considered only physical qualities; he did not realize the supernatural force of a courageous faith devoted to the cause of Jehovah that had taken up his gauntlet. The battle was not to be one of muscles against muscles, and of skill against skill, but of truth against falsehood, reverence against blasphemy, calm trust in God against braggard defiance of God.

A single believer with the Lord on his side is a match to any godless opposition, no matter how formidable its dimensions. The rise and progress of the Christian religion is a commentary on this text: twelve humble men in remote Palestine start out to conquer the world, and succeed.

The lives of individual Christians are full of such uneven conflicts and surprising outcomes. It seems unreasonable, when one looks at the matter with the eyes of a man. But to the eye of faith there is nothing unreasonable in the outcome of this unequal combat. Faith expects to conquer in every conflict, not by its own strength, but by him who makes the timid bold and the feeble strong.

W. H. T. D.

Humility

SATURDAY, March 2. Phil. 2:7. "He made himself of no reputation." Jesus being in the form of God, made himself in the likeness of men, assuming the form of a servant. He gave himself away, died under shame and disgrace of a condemned criminal, on a cruel cross. The way to become godlike is not by grasping but by giving, not by self-seeking, but by self-surrender, not by strife and vainglory but by lowliness of mind. The way to God is the humble, suffering, self-denying way of the cross.

Jesus was not man; he took on him the form of man; "God sent his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, but He was not sinful." Behold God taking the fashion of man that he might sympathize with, suffer and die to redeem every man. He who humbly himself shall be exalted, like the God-man who has a name above every name, a throne above every throne, where every knee shall bow in confession that Christ is Lord of all.

"Before honor goes humility." Are we like-minded, willing to suffer the loss of our good name, be cast out as evil, of no reputation for Christ's sake? Are we willing to suffer the loss of all things to win him and win men to him as he did to win the world? Was not Paul's life a vivid illustration of this idea? He was in prison for Jesus' sake when he wrote to the Philippians. His humiliation is now vindicated by the eternal weight of glory; having had no reputation among men, he stands loftiest among the mightiest in the heavenly places.

Are you sure of your brakes?

Unreliable brakes are a constant menace to your safety

The traffic officer signals you to stop and it takes six or eight feet more than you thought necessary.

Perhaps in most cases it means nothing more than a little embarrassment.

Suppose, however, it was an emergency that demanded a sudden stop.

Those few feet might mean the difference between safety and serious accident.

Your brakes have always worked and you grow careless of them. They are out of sight and you neglect to inspect them.

But do you ever stop to realize that the safety of your car and its occupants depends absolutely on the efficiency of your brakes? That lack of brake inspection, carried just one day too far, has caused more fatal accidents and the loss of more motor cars than any other source of danger with which the motorist must contend?

Inspection assures safety

To have brakes always efficient is as easy as it is necessary.

Ask your garage man to inspect them regularly.

If they need relining do not buy just "brake lining"—your safety is too important for that. Thermoid brake lining will give you consistently efficient service because of its scientific construction. In its process of manufacture it has three exclusive features.

1. It offers you more material, greater service

There is over 40% more material and 60% more labor used in the manufacture of Thermoid Brake Lining than in any woven brake lining. This abundance of ma-

The National Brake Inspection Movement

YOUR attention is called to this movement which has increased, and will continue to increase the safety of the road, only as all motorists realize their duty to lend it their support, and to have their brakes inspected before the touring season opens.

Inspection will frequently show the need of minor adjustments. By attending to these, greater safety will be assured for everyone—motorists and pedestrians.

Join this movement by having your brakes inspected today.

terial and labor must mean longer wear.

2. It is Grapnalized

Thermoid Brake Lining is Grapnalized, an exclusive process which creates resistance to moisture, oil and gasoline. Thermoid is impervious to any kind of moisture. Moisture will cause brake lining to swell and grab, a source of danger and trouble.

3. It is hydraulic compressed

Every square inch of Thermoid is hydraulic compressed at a pressure of 2000 pounds.

Because of this Thermoid is uniform all the way through. It cannot compress in service. There are no soft spots to wear out quickly, causing the brakes to slip. It must give uniform service until worn cardboard-thin.

The measure of Thermoid value

Leading car manufacturers, axle makers and their engineers have selected Thermoid because they have found by scientific tests that its coefficient of friction and wearing qualities meet the most exacting specifications.

Jobbers and dealers carry Thermoid in stock because it gives their customers the longest, safest and most satisfactory service for the lowest possible cost.

Have your dealer inspect your brakes today. He will show you samples of Thermoid Brake Lining that you may see why it is so different, efficient and long wearing. If he hasn't Thermoid we will gladly send a sample.

Be sure to accept no substitute, our guarantee protects you.

Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL. It is positively guaranteed to outwear and give more satisfactory service than any other brake lining.

Fish as Food in War-Time

Supplement the Nation's Larder with Whale and Shark Meat, the Toothsome Grayfish, Sablefish, Burbot and Bowfin

Copyright, 1918, by Frank G. Carpenter

HAVE you ever heard the inside story of how the Japanese conquered the Russians? They did it with fish. The Russians were meat eaters and their supplies in Manchuria had to be brought for more than 5,000 miles over the Transsiberian railroad. The cars were taxed to their utmost capacity and still the soldiers were hungry. The Japanese did their fighting on fish, and they brought their food in by the boatload, smoked, salted and fresh. They lived upon fish and rice.

They had an emergency fish ration about as big as a good-sized banana and of much the same shape. It was a gigantic tabloid of brain and nerve food, and with a few handfuls of rice it made a meal for three or four men. The soldiers could take it along in their knapsacks or pockets, and it was always ready for use. This ration was the bonito, one of the most common fish of Japan. In curing it the bones were first taken out and the flesh then could be shaped with the hands. It was cooked and smoked, after which it was as hard as stone and so dry that it would last for an indefinite time. It was eaten with rice or shaved off in thin slices and made into a soup. The Japanese used it in all their campaigns and it formed a large part of their food supply.

WE shall send vast quantities of dried, smoked and canned fish to Europe, but we can do even more good by increasing our fish diet here and sending more meat to the soldiers. With a view to this end, the Food Administration is advising everyone to eat more fish, and thereby to let loose more of the beef, mutton and pork so much needed. The bureau of fisheries is sending out S. O. S. calls to the people, advising them what our fish supplies are and offering recipes and directions as to how they may be used to advantage. In connection with this it is investigating many of the fishes found in our waters and is adding enormously to our sea-food possibilities.

During the past week I have had a long talk with Dr. Hugh M. Smith, United States commissioner of fisheries, about these new fishes and how they will affect the food supply of the nation. I have before me, as I write, a can of whale beef, and I have just gotten up from a lunch in which the meat dish was whale stew. This meat came from an animal which gave the packers something like five tons of sea-food, enough, at a quarter of a pound to the person, to supply 40,000 men with a meat meal.

WHALE meat is not like fish meat. The whale is a mammal, and it belongs more to such animals as cattle and other beasts which suckle their young. Its young are born alive, and they get their meals from their mother, in the shape of milk, until old enough to forage about for themselves.

Whale meat, when cut from the carcass, is red, just like beef. The fat is white, and on the butcher's block you could hardly distinguish a whale steak from a beefsteak. When cooked and canned it looks like boiled beef, and that I have just eaten tastes much like beef stew or beef à la mode.

I am told that fresh whale tastes much like beefsteak. It has been served at some of the hotels and restaurants of the Pacific Coast cities, and in the markets there has had a ready sale at 10 cents per pound.

I have before me six special ways of cooking this meat, furnished by a whaling company of Bay City, Ore. One is for whale steak, another for whale stew, and others for braised whale and for curried whale on toast. There are also recipes for whale croquettes and for a pot-roast, which requires four pounds of whale meat and should be simmered slowly five hours. Planked whale steak was recently served at one of the leading hotels of New York city. It resembled young pig in texture and taste, and those who ate it said it was palatable.

THE Japanese have been whale eaters for years, and the Eskimos for generations. Shortly before the war broke out the Germans began to consider whale meat as a food for their soldiers, and they have also imported porpoises from Norway. Canned porpoise has been recently sent to our fish bureau, and the experts there have pronounced it delicious.

I am told that about 1,500 whales are annually caught in our Pacific coast waters. The average whale will produce 10,000 pounds of excellent beef, so that the possible food from the whales we are now catching will amount to something like 15,000,000 pounds every year. The whalers are beginning to realize the possibility, and some of the companies are putting up cold-storage plants with a view to packing the meat. We have whaling stations in the states of Washington, Oregon and California and in Alaska. There is one at Port Armstrong, Alaska, which caught several hundred whales last season, and among them sperm whales, sulphur-bottom whales, finbacks and humpbacks. These varieties are among the most common of the whales caught today.

The humpbacks and finbacks are found in both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the sulphur-bottoms are often caught off the shores of our Pacific coast. The sulphur-bottom is about the largest of the whale family, and comparatively few of them would be sufficient to supply an army with meat. One was killed a few years ago which measured ninety-five feet in length and weighed 294,000 pounds.

IN connection with the whale we have an animal that lives in the water which Dr. Alexander Graham Bell has suggested might be domesticated and used to increase our food supply. This is the manatee, or sea cow, which Columbus thought was the mermaid, when he saw it on his first voyage to the West Indies. The manatee is a long-bodied animal, somewhat like a seal in appearance. The animal attains a maximum length of about eighteen feet, and the old bulls weigh half a ton. The female carries her young beneath her flipper, and she suckles it as does a whale. This animal, Dr. Bell says, was swarming in the rivers, bays and lagoons of Florida when the white man first came to America. It is now almost extinct in our country, although there is a protected herd in the Miami river, which with suitable care might be increased and add to the food supply. The animal lives upon vegetables and does all of its eating under the water. Herds could easily be kept in the Florida lagoons.

Many of the little known fishes which are now being exploited by the bureau of fisheries have already become an important part of our food supply. Take the tilefish, which was first discovered by the fish scientists in 1878, but almost destroyed, as far as our waters are concerned, by some submarine disaster which affected it in 1885. At the latter date, tilefish died by the millions, and the ocean near our Atlantic coast was covered with their dead. One sea captain reported that he had sailed for sixty-nine miles through dead fish of this kind, and it is estimated that there was a space in the ocean 170 miles long and 25 miles wide which was paved with dead tile. The number then lost is estimated by the bureau of fisheries to have been 1,400,000,000. Within the past few years the tilefish has come back, and the bureau has brought them into the market for sale. It has shown the people that they are an excellent sea food, and the result is that 12,000,000 pounds were caught and sold last year. The fish is now one of the most popular in New York and Boston, and it will soon be eaten all over the country.

ANOTHER fish which until now has gone to waste, is the spiny dogfish, which the bureau of fisheries has dignified with a new name. The scientists investigated the flesh and found it excellent, but they did not dare to put it forth to the people under the name of dogfish, so gave it a new trademark, "the grayfish," and as such it promises to become one of our most common sea foods, fresh and canned. They are now canning grayfish on the coast of Massachusetts, and it is expected that the salmon canneries of Puget Sound will put it up during the winter, when there are no salmon to pack. The grayfish is found in both the Atlantic and Pacific. It travels about in great schools, besieging the fishing grounds and eating or driving away every fish which is too big to be swallowed. Although the canned product was first known in 1916, grayfish is now selling on the market of thirty states of the Union. It has been handled by the dealers of 128 towns in New York and Pennsylvania alone and it is cheaper than salmon, a can costing only 10 cents. The bureau of fisheries has a book of recipes telling how to cook it.

Another valuable sea product, whose name has been changed by the scientists of the bureau of fisheries, is the black cod, which is found in great quantities off our Pacific coast all the way from San Francisco to Alaska. The name has been changed to the "sablefish" for the reason that it is not a cod, in its family, structure or edible qualities. Codfish is dry, whereas the meat of the sablefish is full of fat. The fish averages fifteen pounds in weight, and can be shipped fresh or frozen all over the country. Until recently this fish was regarded a nuisance and millions of pounds of it were thrown back into the sea. Now that the bureau of fisheries has shown its value, it is becoming one of the most popular of sea foods. It began to be exploited under the name of the sablefish only about a year ago, and by last June more than 2,000,000 pounds of the frozen fish and over 1,000,000 pounds of the fresh were sold by the dealers.

THE bureau of fisheries is calling attention to some fishes of the great lakes, which until now have been practically neglected. One of these is the burbot, which might be called the freshwater cousin of the cod. Its meat is very much like that of the cod and it may be cooked the same way. It was only last spring that attention was called to the burbot as a food possibility, and already more than half a million pounds of it have been marketed by wholesale fish dealers. A vast quantity will be caught and sold this season.

The fish scientists at Washington are making all sorts of experiments in the preparation and curing of fish. They will send you recipes as to how to use salt and smoked fish, and a bulletin recently issued gives you a new recipe of that kind for every week the year through. They have also prepared directions for smoking fish, including a design for a smokehouse, which can be built for a very few dollars. They have found that many of our fishes which are not especially palatable in a fresh state are delicious when properly cured, and they say that carp, river sturgeon and bowfin are excellent when smoked.

The bowfin has been found to be especially valuable as a smoked fish and it will add greatly to our food supplies. This fish grows to a length of two feet and a weight of twelve pounds. The bowfin is found in the great lakes region, the Mississippi valley and the streams of the Atlantic coast from New York to Florida. It likes the weedy waters along the shores, going into the shallows at night and returning to the deeper places by day. It can be raised in ponds, and it is said that you can put it in a rain barrel and keep it all summer without changing the water. The bowfin can be captured with a net or set-lines, or it can be caught with a hook and line. It is considered one of the gamiest of fishes.

HOW would you like to eat a shark? You will probably be doing so before this war is over, and if the fish authorities tell the truth, you will find it delicious. During the past summer they have tested six species of sharks in the government fish laboratory at Woods Hole and have fed their flesh to fifty people. The meat was cooked in different ways and was pronounced not only good for food but especially pleasing in flavor and texture. They have been smoking and salting shark meat, and the smoked shark is equal to smoked herring and can be marketed much more cheaply. They have been introducing shark meat to the general public, having it served at luncheons and dinners in different parts of the country. I am told that some of the sharks taken in the New England waters last summer were dressed and their meat shipped to New York as swordfish, bringing in the market as high as 20 cents per pound.

Gleanings from the Mission Fields

ONE of the missionaries of the American Presbyterian Church at Matsuyama, Japan, recently received a postal from a young man, not a Christian, in which he asks her to "Lead us to heaven." The card reads—"Imagine that it will be very good for us that we consist of the party whose are anxious to study in the Bible. I wish you that, would you not teach us the Bible and lead us to the heaven, if you please or not."

A few years ago changes began to come over the Asiatic world. The Russo-Japanese War aroused the East out of sleep. Developments in China, Japan, Tibet, Russia, India, Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan have shown that these Eastern peoples were reaching out for something beyond. The great War which is now going on bids fair to furnish the climax for this development in Asia. The Ameer of Afghanistan has built main roads throughout the length and breadth of his hermit empire, and is quoted as saying that after this war his country is to be opened to the advance of civilization. The greatest opportunity of all Asia lies before us. Now is the time to be given every facility in order that we may push forward and vigorously follow up our successes and opportunities.

Rev. Dwight M. Donaldson, of the East Persia Mission, stationed at Meshed, writes—"With the outlook for religious liberty in Russia which now seems to be so favorable, it would seem that the missionaries in Turkestan and Khorassan might push their work vigorously, for with religious freedom permanently established in Russia there will no longer in Meshed be the feeling that the Christian missionary in this sacred realm of Islam is living on the crest of a volcano."

Mrs. Calvin Wight, missionary at Tangchowfu, tells of famine conditions in China. She writes: "Between us and the sea is a field of the tall grain we call gaoliang, which has been almost completely stripped of its leaves by the poor of the city, trying to find fuel for their kitchen fires. When we cut our millet, the poor came out in families, and the hired reapers seemed to take them all for Ruths, for each woman and child had 'handfuls of purpose' and went away with baskets and armfuls of grain. It seemed a pity to stop them, but the memory of one hundred mouths to feed led us to send them word to wait until the reapers were done. So the gleaners sat in groups among the graves, or by the roadside, and waited. When the last stalk was cut and carried off, they pounced upon the land and raked it bare. We had our lawn cleared of wild grass for nothing, as the gleaners were only too glad to pull up the roots for fuel."

How a Solomonian Korean magistrate treated gambling offenders is told in a letter from Missionary F. S. Miller of Chungju, who writes: "Magistrate Kim is a rare official. When he forbade gambling and a group of gamblers were caught, he took them to the market-place, had a mat spread for them, gave them a pack of cards and some capital, and told them to gamble now to their hearts' content. When lunch time came, he told them they liked gambling so much they would not wish to stop for lunch. At supper time he made the same sympathetic remark, to the amusement of the gathered crowd. The sun set, and the marketers began to leave for their homes and the peddlers to gather up their wares, but Mr. Kim generously gave a servant some money and told him to buy a pack of candles, enough to last all night. When the culprits saw the candles lit, they began to plead for deliverance, and promised to move from the country if he let them off this once. On that promise he let them go, and four weary, hungry, sinner gamblers ran for the nearest inn and disappeared the next day."

"You use doilies—and still your table is beautiful and spotless. How do you do it?"

"Why—it's very simple—just use Johnson's Prepared Wax."

EVERY HOUSEWIFE can easily keep her home attractive by devoting a little attention to her furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum. All they need is an occasional application of Johnson's Prepared Wax. — This cleans, polishes and protects the finish, adding years to its life.

Johnson's Prepared Wax imparts a high, dry, glasslike polish of great beauty and durability. It covers up mars and surface scratches — preserves the varnish — and prevents checking.

JOHNSON'S Liquid and Paste PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax contains no oil—consequently it does not gather or hold the dust — and it never becomes soft in the hottest weather, or from the heat of the body. — It will quickly and permanently remove that bluish, cloudy film from your piano and your mahogany furniture.

Johnson's Prepared Wax is now made in liquid form as well as paste. The Liquid Wax polishes instantly with but very little rubbing. You can go over a roomful of furniture, a good sized floor, or an automobile in half-an-hour.

A Dust-Proof Auto Polish

Automobile owners will find Johnson's Liquid Wax the most satisfactory polish for their cars. It sheds water and dust, and makes a "wash" last twice as long. Protects and preserves the varnish. Write for our folder on "Keeping Your Car Young"—it's free.

The economy that is built upon quality

The standards of Yale products are quality standards first and last. They are not governed by price.

Quality in materials and design and workmanship—in service and durability and fitness.

Quality in security and protection and decoration and utility.

Quality that never varies, that never compromises; quality that has been unchanged for half a century.

That is "Yale" quality—the kind of quality that brings true economy to the buyer of any Yale product. Add to that quality moderation in price and you have the answer why "Yale" is the standard by which all locks and hardware are judged.

That is the quality guaranteed by the trade-mark Yale—the trade-mark put on every Yale product as visible evidence of its superiority. See that trade-mark "Yale" or you won't get Yale.

HOWARD CHASE

By PASTOR CHARLES M. SHELDON, Author of "In His Steps"

CHAPTER VII

HOWARD CHASE was in the habit of reading his Scripture just before his sermon. And when he reached that place in the service on that memorable Sunday morning in Red Hill, he began to read from a modern version, so different from the version Red Hill people had always heard that they actually sat up and listened to it—a thing they had not done for years, as the Bible had been read in a listless, perfunctory manner from the pulpit.

He announced that his text for his sermon was the entire passage he was going to read, and simply stating the name of the author of the modern version, he gave out the passage as found in James, third chapter, beginning at the second verse; and a passage from the fourth chapter, the eleventh verse.

As Howard began to read, Deacon Burton shot a side glance at Deacon Allen, who always sat in a particular pew the second row from the pulpit, under one of the east windows.

His face was a study for the higher critic, to say nothing of a painter of church windows.

A strange conflict had been going on in Deacon Allen since the advent of the new minister into Red Hill. The deacon was a born conservative of the most conservative type. He had not had a new idea on religion for forty years. And he did not intend to have one for forty years more if he could help it. He was an implement dealer in business and he was constantly buying and selling new and improved farm machinery. But his religious mind was still using the sickle and scythe and wooden plow, and his soul recoiled with holy horror at the thought of a twine binder, a header or a traction plow in the religious field. The religion of Deacon Allen's mind had stood still in its tracks so long that it was incapable of movement or change, and his views of the Bible, of God, of inspiration, of the Atonement and the church were so defined for himself that he could no more break away from them and mark out a fresh and new road than the Chinese traveler over the century-old ruts of the wooden wheel roads from Nanking to Shansi can get out of the twenty-foot deep gullies made by the passage of millions of Chinamen for hundreds of years.

AND yet the deacon was capable of a personal affection of a real and positive sort, and it was this fact that was troubling and vexing him right now. From the first handshake with this fiery, enthusiastic, unselfish, winsome, independent young preacher, something up in Deacon Allen's conservative mind and down in his affection-stirred heart had gone out toward the minister like hunger after a meal. And yet it was a tug on the deacon's part between his intellect and his religion, such as they were, and his emotions and his friendship, such as they wanted to be, that disturbed him tremendously on this memorable occasion. And as Deacon Burton glanced at him he could hardly repress a grin even there in church at the sight of the inward struggle visible on the deacon's face.

When Howard announced the Scripture, reading from James's Epistle, Deacon Allen prepared his mind to hear the words and phrases he had always heard in church. But when Howard, with the abrupt and cheerful lack of apology which characterized his quick mind, made the statement that he was going to read from a modern version of the Bible that had just come out, Deacon Allen sat up with a start that jolted his whole body. If Howard had proposed to read a selection from Shakespeare or O. Henry, Deacon Allen could not have been more horrified than to hear his King James version calmly set aside and an uninspired set of words and phrases put in its place in the pulpit. For a moment Deacon Burton as he looked at Deacon Allen had a disturbed question on his mind, wondering if Deacon Allen would actually rise and enter a public protest against what he regarded as rank sacrilege. But no such thing occurred to interrupt Howard's even reading of the new version, only Deacon Allen's face grew sterner and more rigid in its decided disapproval as the reading proceeded. And yet, if the deacon's heart had been able to register as plain a testimony as his face, it would have been tremendously interesting to note that even with all this unheard-of heresy on the part of the minister, the deacon's affection for the young man up there was pleading with his mental and religious convictions to wait and let events take their course rather than utter the protest his life-long habits urged him to utter. He would, he said to himself, have it out with Brother Chase in private or make his protest at a formal gathering of the Board of Trustees. For this departure from a time-honored and sacred use of God's Word was not to be tolerated. He should have asked the consent of the people. He should have conferred with his deacons before doing such a radical thing. This was a dangerous example to set the young people.

DEACON ALLEN'S mind would not attempt to analyze the purpose of Brother Chase in giving this reading, and he did not try to excuse the act from any angle. He was too much disturbed mentally and religiously to analyze anything except his own disturbance. But after the first few sentences he did follow with painful attention the words ascribed to James the apostle, whom Deacon Allen had always vaguely thought of as the apostle of King James and possibly a near and honored relative.

"For we often stumble and fall," Howard began, "all of us. If there is any one who never stumbles in speech, that man has reached maturity of character and is able to curb his whole nature. Remember that we put the horses' bits into their mouths to make them obey us, and so we turn their whole bodies around. So too with ships, great as they are, and often driven along by strong gales, yet they can be steered by a very small rudder in whichever direction the caprice of the man at the helm chooses. In the same way the tongue is an insignificant part of the body, but it is immensely boastful. Remember how a mere spark may set a forest in flames.

"And the tongue is a fire. That world of iniquity, the tongue, is placed within us spotting and soiling our whole nature, and setting the whole round of our lives on fire, being itself set on fire by Gehenna. For brute nature under all its forms—beasts and birds, reptiles and fishes—can be subjected and kept in subjection by human nature. But the tongue no man or woman is able to tame. It is an ever busy mischief, and is full of deadly poison. With it we bless the Lord and Father, and with it we curse men, who are made in God's likeness. Out of the same mouth there proceed blessing and cursing.

"My brethren, this ought not to be. In a fountain, are fresh water and bitter sent forth from the same opening? Can a fig tree, my brethren, yield olives, or a vine yield figs? No; and neither can salt water yield sweet. . . .

"Do not speak evil of one another, brethren. The man who speaks evil of a brother man or judges his brother man speaks evil of the law and judges the law. But if you judge the law you are no longer one who obeys the law, but one who judges it. The only real Lawgiver and Judge is He who is able to save or to destroy. Who are you to sit in judgment on your fellow man?"

Those in the congregation who were noticing Howard's face most closely saw the tense gathering of the rigid lines that straightened his lips, and those near the pulpit caught the swift darkening of his eyes as he began to preach.

IT is doubtful if any large number of people in that audience that day could have reported that sermon exactly. But it is safe to say there was not a person ten years old who did not understand the meaning it had for Red Hill. Howard had not spoken two minutes before every one present understood perfectly that the fiery young preacher was preaching not simply to his audience but to the whole town. Its besetting sin of gossip was getting the most thorough thrashing it had ever had. There was something terrifying in the aspect of the speaker as he lashed out right and left at men and women who destroyed reputations with a sentence and blasted character with a word. And then gradually the audience became aware he was drawing the application down close to something strictly personal to himself. The story that had been going the rounds—he had used it all skillfully, making out a supposable case—suppose such a story were to get started and spread until people believed it and without being able to prove a single part of it in court; suppose the parties interested could not defend themselves except by a denial; suppose all this—what sort of a community must that be that would ruin a life or tear in pieces a reputation, cruelly denying to the parties concerned the only defense they had, and taking for granted that they were liars. The depth of such community depravity he did not attempt to measure. James put it as strong as language could put it when he said the tongue spotted and soiled the whole nature and set the whole round of life on fire, being set on fire itself by hell.

AT this point he boldly abandoned the ground he had taken of an imaginary case, and with the voice and gesture and feeling of a young prophet he rebuked Red Hill collectively for its cruel and unchristian treatment not of himself but of Inez. And as he boldly uttered her name it seemed to every one, including even Inez herself, that somehow he was defending not simply an individual but a principle. Inez, sitting there in a tumult of feeling which she did not have sense enough to analyze, nevertheless seemed to be astonishingly free from personal embarrassment, as if he were speaking of some one else, and as he went on she found herself entertaining a feeling for Howard that was new to her, a feeling of great gratitude and almost awe at the bewildering thought that he was openly and without fear shielding her reputation as if he had met some wild beast on the streets of Red Hill just ready to spring at her, and had seized it by the throat and was choking it to death. For the first time in her life she realized what her reputation (of which she had been ready to be careless) meant to her, and her heart beat a new note as she dimly began to feel the magnitude of the service Howard was rendering her.

And yet, after that great outburst of righteous wrath against the wicked judgment Red Hill had been eager to pass on the innocent, including Inez and herself, in the face of his direct and fiery denial of any guilt ascribed by the story that had gone the rounds, as Howard paused a second in his indignant denunciation, he caught in one sickening moment the effect of his sermon on his congregation.

It had been soundly rebuked and sat cowed and beaten by it. The terrific blows Howard had dealt, based on James's tongue-lashing of the tongue, had gone home, and men and women sitting there recalling past instances in which they had sentenced the innocent, revealed on their faces a consciousness of shame.

Howard Chase

BUT with that sure but intangible sense which a public speaker has of the attitude of his hearers, Howard caught the verdict of the people as clearly as if it had been shouted aloud:

"What you say about the gossiping habits of Red Hill may all be true, and we feel rebuked and guilty and all that; but your denial of guilt is the denial of a man who has not been in Red Hill a month, and it is unsupported by any other witness, and—" and at this point Howard felt the sting of public judgment a sting that left a certain poison in his life that was destined to linger in it for a long time even after that judgment was reversed. They were not believing him; they were still counting him guilty; they would go out from the service with their tongues in their cheeks and with the innuendo of an unconvinced mind whisper to one another as they walked home, "He put up a great preach, but—well, you know how it is. And did you watch the girl? Well—"

The whole horrible result of allowing gossip to pour its poison into the very life of the community was becoming plain to him as he paused in that second when he had looked for vindication and victory, and realized that he faced a sullen whipped audience that still held wickedly to doubt and incredulity.

He had never been nearer disaster and despair in all his life than at that moment. It seemed to him in one sharp moment as if it were of no use to be good. He staggered on his feet and grasped the edge of his pulpit to steady himself. He felt as if in another moment he would be renouncing Red Hill, his ministry, the church, and possibly his own faith.

And at that moment, when his mind was on the very balancing edge of some tragic decision, Agnes Burton stood up in her place in the chorus.

She had been sitting there through the service, her mind and heart troubled over many things. From the moment of Howard's coming into the little town Agnes Burton had begun a new existence. She was intelligent, resourceful, attractive mentally and physically, happy in her work as a teacher, surrounded at home by comfort and affection, enthusiastic over her profession without being a faddist, a cultured reader and a cheerful observer, a favorite with her pupils and honored and trusted by Red Hill, which felt proud of its high school teacher and gave her the rare tribute of perfect confidence.

HOWARD CHASE came into the little town bringing into it the one thing it lacked, an original, dominating personality, clean-minded, purposeful, happy, fiery and intensely religious without being sectarian. Not that Red Hill lacked educated men. There was more than one college and university man in Howard's congregation. But Agnes Burton had never met, except in fiction, any one like Howard and it is not betraying any secret to say that she had already permitted the thought of him to occupy far more place in her heart than was good for the peace of mind of a high school teacher who is devoted to her profession of teaching.

And her mind was troubled. Why had the minister, almost from that first day he had met her, the Sunday morning after his first sermon, seemed to be on his guard in a peculiar way? He was courteous, a perfect gentleman, if sometimes absent-minded; he was delightfully humorous; he was simple as a child in his frankness; and yet, like some invisible cord that stretched between him and some possible better understanding, in the brief time he had been in Red Hill and an occasional visitor at her father's house, a barrier was gently but firmly raised.

Why had he not asked her to refute the story going around? Was it pride, or a sense of his own sufficiency? She did not know. But as he went on with his sermon she was swift to realize the incredulity of the congregation. She saw what he felt so keenly and knew in a moment that her testimony was the one thing that could save his standing with the people. And she found herself facing the audience, the right word on her lips and the accent of absolute truth speaking with voice and eye and bodily movement.

Well was it for her and the future of Howard Chase that she occupied a unique place in the confidence of Red Hill. It had never once questioned her word, never once doubted, as her father had told Howard. And as she went on to say that she was with Rose on that particular evening from which the story had started and knew from personal knowledge that Inez had never been into the minister's study, the audience responded to her statement, and like an audible vote of confidence, Howard, as he still stood by the pulpit, saw the reversal of judgment the people had passed on his own denial.

HE had not even turned his head in the direction of Agnes Burton while she was speaking. He had remained standing there, sternly facing the people, noting with keen sensitiveness their change of attitude, a blending of emotions stirring his whole being as she spoke. And when she sat down, he still stood there, the stern look softened a little, but the spirit of abstraction on his face, his eyes with a vision of other things in them, something the people could not read.

It was very still for several moments. Then he suddenly bowed his head and offered a prayer, so tender, so close to the divine, that the quiet deepened and the people seemed moved by a real Presence from another world, a world made real by his own nearness to it. A period of several seconds after the prayer, he spoke the Benediction, but the people remained in their seats, not moving until Howard himself started to go down the pulpit steps.

He had taken one stride in his swift impulsive manner when a sudden commotion was seen in the choir seats. Agnes Burton was leaning over Inez, who had fainted. Mrs. Burton went up to the platform, and others crowded up, and Inez was finally carried out into the Sunday-school room, and Miss Burton went home with Inez when she recovered. That was one reason why Howard did not see Agnes Burton until the evening service, when she presided at the organ with the outdoor chorus. And after the first moment of disappointment he was glad he would have time to think over more at his leisure the whole event.

When he went down from the platform the first to greet him were his chum Roy Lennox and his wife. Tears were on their faces as they grasped his hands. They did not understand all that had led up to the morning, but they could not fail to understand its great meaning to Howard.

The people greeted him, as he moved down the aisle, with a mingling of shame and pride. Shame at their own conduct, pride that their minister was free from guilt. He was the center of every look, the object of all talk in the church and outside.

THE Expressman had managed to get into the vestibule, and as the crowd there was slowly going out he rubbed up against the Santa Fe Agent, who also had been able to leave his station for the service.

"I dunno just how you feel," said the Expressman. "But if there'd been a crack in the wagon small enough I'd a leaked through this morning."

"He give it to us straight, all right," said the Agent very soberly. "He run a special and had the right o' way over even Number Three."

"It'll be some time, I reckon," said the Expressman as he reached the sidewalk, "before the women do any more talkin' about Mr. Chase."

"Yes, or the men either," said the Agent. "It seemed to me the order sent out by Superintendent James applied to all the employees male and female."

"Are you preachin' at me?" said the Expressman cautiously: "Because if you are, I don't mind sayin' I feel mighty mean right now, and if I felt any meaner I'd be afraid I was goin' to join a church or somethin'."
